THE ICEBOATS AT ROKEBY

From my point of view I'd rather be closer to the action where the ice actually meets the sunrays and decrystallization starts—the iceboats under Barrytown slither fast along the slush coaxed by the north wind—we live all solid winter for this hour but I stay hpme, I, who am the feeblest part of us, the skeptic, the timid, the myopic, the absentee landlord of the clouds.

2.

So spring me no raptures on swift mahogany hulls of someone's grandpa's time, I stay at home. But honor here, sheer as Pindar, the exploits of those who even stand on the ice of tidal rivers testing Newton and making guarddian angels fret, let alone those who skim along the surface inches over an opposing current (said river flows both ways) could in a moment sweep them under then farewell Love and all the loco venery pf not quite springtime.

3.

And the girl made him do it, walk to the frtozen island over the frozen tide. That made uneasy rendezvous among scrubby pines and boulders of the rock they skidded their way to and soon departed.

O the hoots of laughter in the heart of desire, laugh at yourself for wanting, laugh for having, laugh for having had, as in the famous sonnet, laugh for lack of a more sinister dismay , the shame that melts this kindly discreet and isolating ice away.

slivers down to a slit of the seen, the painting turns into a door, narrow but you can open it and sometimes go through.

1.

Agitation in the lower house the Senate sleeping upstairs the nation has tinnitus interminable speeches at the rostrum the hum of nothingness to block all change.

Orpheus wakes up in hell, pulses throbbing in his temples, forgets all about Eurydice, who's she?

The buzz of dying insects fills the air, hell is the silence of the father, the noise of everything else.

3.

The siege continues.

There is no peace.

The city has always been surrounded.

Some citizens escape to the country where the trees watch them.

Sometimes there is a quiet they mistake for a message from someone who is not there.

Is never there.

They go back to the trembling streets and whisper of what they have seen, the Lamb slain in the sky dying in its own blood the farmers told them was the Sun.

The years engage.

The chariots

tumble past,

each warrior

a name

almost forgotten,

turn a blind eye on what just happens.

For this is form and Form is lovely, nurturing by its nature and when we have seen the form of things we are complete.

The girls of Brooklyn wore pale satin blouses they could hardly keep tucked in snug waistbands of their modest skirts—to think that this is all I know about the world!

2.

I who was a senator of grammar and vice-president of theodicy smiling right and left with a graham cracker in each hand barely remember the Murtha girls who lived around the corner on Sutter Avenue where the gulls from the coast came to dawn patrol.

3.

Or even closer to the bay at Santa Fortunata's annual autumn bash the bigger girls whose names I never got to know wore black and purple on their tawny arms and smiled in dark places between the gaudy booths oil vat boiling up the zeppole huge clacketing wheel of the tombola.

4.

Is that enough recall, Dr. Semaphore?
Can I go back to sleep now, the comfy dream called ordinary everyday, this now and no remember?

Blue is a kind of green isn't it? The grass that covers the sky.

You kissed me once and that too was a mistake, wrong mixture in the beaker made the litmus turn bright blue.

Never mind who,
if the kiss fits, share it.

There are so few left to lose, so many to fear—no wonder I keep wishing

I was still the altar boy I never was, sure of wide green fields, sea birds, marshlands where the streets end, a dog at the door, the nearsighted stars.

Help. I have a hawk in the head.

It harries everywhere, fierce single eye is all I see on all I see. The fine discriminations of a bird's eye finding the world to prey on.

To consume. Help.

The hawk always ready to fly.

dlya Mashi

The 'infinite wall' white wood curved fiddle-form out to bell around who knows what would have to be white ribs bowed out ivory round human thorax where the heart has its house, four rooms of boundless space bone wall around infinity.

Listen, April, it's time for you to come again, big breasted with flowers, make a diva
of our back lawn. a Russian general's chest of the meek flowerbed around the birdbath, come with your hair full of forsythia, come with your wild ducks and blackbirds, lilacs on all your fingers.

I'm tired of what I don't know ignorances gnaw at me annoying as joggers on quiet morning—what can they be fleeing? where is there so worth running to? who are they sweating in baseball caps, dogs trotting easy by the master's desperate rush.
See, I have drifted into prejudices.
Damn dog. Damn fitness. Damn exercise.
They're all just cover-ups for ignorance—just sit in your awkward armchair and grow wise: make a list of all that you don't know, start with Adam's mother and then go on to what date to whittle on your tombstone.
And who was Robin Hood? And where would you get if you got up right now and started running, yes, with all those dogbesotted sweat-pants wearing narcissists out there panting their pilgrimage to Jerusalem?

LEARNING CURVE

Cloud cover front of house out back

still sun

then not.

So much to figure out.

Daedals and hoplites hierodules and parasangs.

Everything fits together but in what? And where?

3.

Dilapidations. Spirited rebuttals of small religions already on the ropes.

Beleaguer me with information, I am a mistake all ready to make myself.

Once I thought I knew about the city but it was the city knew about me.

Even if I did know better im not sure better is the name for it broken cabbage heads strewn behind the Stop & Shop pale cars already at dawn cruising down 9G—all this should mean nothing to me but in fact it has its arms around my life like the goddess Tiamat in the old stories who wrapped herself around everything so they would wake and breed and sleep again and feed her with the infinity of their dreams.
