WHAT I REALLY WANT TO SAY

for Steven Holl

is about poetry (always) is about architecture I mean music, yes. How can I tell them apart? I'll try.

How they use us to make us become ourselves.

What I really wanted to say is about poiesis the Greek verb poiein means to make so anybody who makes anything has to be a poet so when we were evicted by spirit from the caves we moved into houses structures built by the first poets, the architects isn't the house the first thing they, we, really made?

So poetry and music make time pass and architecture makes space pass into meaningful form.

No.

I mean architecture makes music stand still.

That's more like it:

here time turns into space

Space and place, can they be the same?

Place happens to space, is architecture in a place or does it make the place itself happen to space.

The way music happens to time.

So there is usually a street and sometimes a fountain —a thing that moves up and glistens while the eye reaches out and out—and there's a girl walking by and another eating lunch on a bench because a place is a plaza.

But what I really wanted to say is that the poem stretches on and on like an avenue of mysterious buildings who on earth lives in all those houses apartments single rooms who climbs down the stairs or stumbles at midnight, who opens the brass letter boxes o my god who are all these people eating their lunch in the middle of the poem and looking at each other and wondering what it all means and then they come to the end of a line and decide well enough of this it's time to go home home to their room home to their own place.

was that the word 'room' really means 'space'— like German Lebensraum, space to live in—is there room for living in this poem you're writing o poet and o composer are you leaving space in your music for someone to live in, really and truly be alive inside your music, not just some background noise, not just some sad background-life while you drone on?

I know it's not polite to ask but we sort of know what architecture does rough and ready we inhabit it and when we're lucky it changes us, guides our footsteps and the way we feel about doing whatever we're doing that brings us there, swinking or swiving, a building holds all.

So what I really wanted to say was that these arts do something to time as it goes by not just make it pass as Beckett had his losers say, the time will pass by itself all right, it knows how to do that, or that is all time knows.

And do we know more than what music tells us as it flows past?
We sit in the plaza on a marble bench and read poems to one another whispering or waving our arms and why not, somebody has to make things move, make the shadows dance in and out of the shadows of great buildings.

But does time ever really pass?
Isn't time just a superstition, a flaw in our attention to the permanent?
And if time passes can we learn how to stop it and make it pool out around us so that we stand or sit in the shallow water of moveless time, this static stream or time might be a fountain springing up and falling down a salmon-leap of time out into space, into room, so that when we see a building we know that time is safe there, an artist's hour hammered into place and we can be, just be.

Has he turned time into space?

was there and back again, the swell of music held in the mouth of the poem spoken to the girl eating her lunch in the great nest of plazas of many levels Steven Holl built in China, a city in a city, a poem someone is reciting, annoying the poor girl eating her lunch, my god how can I look at that plaza and not start writing a poem, a poem with musics and levels and fountains and food, it's hard work to eat chewing and swallowing all the inward mysteries thereafter, hard work

the poem and the song, Hegel infamously remarked a building is a frozen song, well yes, but everything is,
what I really wanted to say was that everything approximates music but a building is exact, demands space move its hips and shoulders this way not that way, or is architecture also a chanceful music, turning space into space so that we can get lost for a long time, in a long song of corridors and pentagons and Moorish geometries, the way John Cage's 4'33" turns time into time, our dear Christless fundamentalist, our sweet raw Pythagoras, daring to turn common time into pure time-time transmuted by attention—he'll never let us be sure if he was the great Alchemist or the Wizard of Oz, but the time changed. And stays changed, he moved on to the next town and left us with an empty room full of pure time.

We shake our heads and say Next time we'll do better, we'll be ready for him, and dance to his tune.
But what does "next time" mean?

Can there be another time after this time?
That's where poetry comes in, and if quoting myself I should say again time transmuted by attention a measured, noticed time is as much music as Heinrich Biber's, the glorious whine of whose archaic strings won't leave you alone for a second, she looks up from her paper plate and hears the time singing round her ears spoken by the shapes and shades of great buildings and now she knows, and now she's only now.

Can a poem, though, such as I'm trying to make or bend your way now, can a man outlast time?

Can it get where it's going before I get there?

When I was a child the greatest thrill was riding on the escalator Macy's Gimbel's Wanamaker's floor to floor and always rising and no one to stop even a child from going up and watching the people on the way down, clutching bags neat brown packages, content, descending into ordinary space while I rose up, finally reaching the dim cool floor where furs were sold and I turned back from the fear of dead animals, what could it mean to live in a world where animals die and their skins rest on lovely women of a certain age, that's why we hurry down again to the ordinary floors, the street, the paper plates littering the gutter, she's closed her book and gone back to work, the half-eaten sandwich, the poem read halfway through and never finished.

But something was always going up, even if we didn't have the wit or will to endure its beauty, like James Tenney's electronic For Anne, Rising, where the sound goes up and up and never stops that climb but is always present, or Joan Tower's wonderful Platinum Spirals, violin conquering time by rising always in one place, or when the thunder walks through the valley and everybody and everything knows itself suddenly walked into by that sound, invaded, persuaded, frightened, spared—

was that I'm tired of poetry being a blueprint not a house I'm tired of music being something that comes and goes I want the word to be a house and the tune to be something you climb on and travel but how can I say that?

is how can words make you hear how can words make—a poem is something made can it make a place you can actually walk around in, stretch out in, reach a wall you can lean against warm in sunlight and close your eyes?

was that poetry wants to close your eyes so you open them suddenly in a new space, the way doors and windows do o these architects these poets who can build an opening anywhere they choose can open space and let us in but can I break open even a single word to make you see?
