Curses in alleys
turn blessings on boulevards.
And why? The blind street-singer in the empty square in sunlight.
The whole city silent
except for his voice.
Who knows what blind men see?

Who knows the weird forgiveness of the dark?

The legate of the distant Emperor inspects the lake wanting it to be more than water, the wind to be more than any air, the earth more than a house.

The legate has been educated to expect things to bend to the imperial will. The moon gives too little light, the sun much too much—everything else belongs to human politics.

I am near the gate
but don't go through.
This recalcitrance (dragging the heels) is a lifelong occupation.
No wonder women
write books and men
read them, there must be some way of knowing what we think, we
who just like me dither
at every threshold
too dark, too light—
thousands of years.

The roses of beginning and the rose of Sharon of now—you'll
understand me, E,

you who walked so many miles through time
alone, ardent witness
of what now brings.

So someone sitting in the house does rule the world—
it happens simple as that—sunshine, snow, rain, the whole encyclopedia of whatever just happens.

Awareness is control. The barriers crumbled long ago, the empty boulevards stretch out far as the Moon Gate at the city's edge. See it.

Grasp it. You are the barbarian who writes it all down.

When a child all by himself learns to sit still the angels all through the universe shout joy and praise and relief—the Redeemer is almost here!

29 August 2010

or, simply, a child sitting quietly, alertly, still, is the holiest being in nature

What happens to the hollow when the rain falls in.
Things change. But never the feel of their form.

Whatever lasts feels like food for some other person more or less than human but kindly, quiet, far.

We also live by form.
Hot need and quiet
policy to feed upon whatever passes by.

Writing into the green
each blade a stroke
the lawn a palimpsest

for real—everybody
wrote this. A field
forty years ago
a forest now, small,
crowding up to the light.

I think we learned from everything,
I think there is no place not inscribed, masterstrokes of human will fragments of the message.

From no one to no one
by way of you.

Nothing to catch hold of now—a breeze, cool night very hot day.
It is to be in a place
until it lets you go.
More than we know
we belong to the weather.

How to be austere
and still fill up the page.
The Irish know—the bleak object-oriented love of theirs makes every word equivalent, every story bitter sugar tells the same: listen to me, it says, listen to me or I die, then you'll be alone with yourself one more broken little island ink-stained fingers pale cold flanks.

The swash of identity
so evident so dear
I know each of these people, every one, whether they fascinate me with their clothes their welcoming yesses their scared but withering noes—they all are mine by virtue of my city, they are mine, almost me.

Spring Street Revelation
eating sugarfree butter pecan, a cone, beside Charlotte eating chocolate, chairs
so sidewalk modest,
so many pass our folding chairs and I am all of them.

GLIMPSES

Always be near the other.

Wild man.

The love that falls

fell on the overweening—

quotations from the obvious, a glass.

A glass of.

What

do you mean by wild.

There is a caravan that goes through the desert scholars bent over their books rubbing their eyes to get out the sand.

2.

Park in the wrong place

your life changes.

mKha'-spyod. Who is it (and how) enjoys the sky?

Inhabits its intelligence,

boundless, undistracted

by any random objects.

3.

One calf Vivien Leigh

one some other babe.

The legs' woman passed

too quick down subway steps for us to read.

The pictures vanished first.

A young woman

with the faces of two handsome actresses

tattooed on her legs,

why, why.

All night I'll try to figure it out.

And wonder what other faces she has chosen to smile from her skin, and where.

And why.

Lagoon side. Aspect
where in daylight swans.
Coasting unseen
by the autumn mallow
saucer pink. Malva
becomes French mauve Steiner's holy color—
the light inside our bodies shimmers thus,
all colors exalted
in this.

As in a man's or woman's face the whole universe is specified.

Empty in the presence of God.

A chalice. He is there already. The wine

is for us, the bread.

Oracle of the bird.

Nuthatch. Woodpecker family.

Approaches target upside down.

Black-capped. A little rebbe walking head down. "Why don't men see God anymore in these days?"

"Because they never look down."

How to do it. Invert everything.

Turn the process upside down, find the stars in the stagnant pool.

Gay Science. Black and white.

Walk down my tree.

(Any bird is an ambiguity.)

Just call and say no
if you can't say yes.

The burden of beauty
weighs on both of us

of course in obviously different ways.

The French say "you must suffer to be beautiful" so pick up the phone and call,

you bitch my god.

What happens when the curtain of the body's lifted?
This blood is a word being spoken, spirit lives in it half-oxygen half-soul. The rest of me's a shoreline for its unrelenting flow. The ones who made the body may not be strong enough to keep it from decay—or do they know better?—the blacksmith builds his iron fence but can't keep the rust away.
Time tells a different story from the one we want to hear.
So want a different thing. Or give up wanting, cruise through the morning feeding on sunbeams, cries of sparrows, faithfully holding nothing at all in mind.
There is a logic in what I'm saying here, find it if you can or care, but better yet (as Spicer says) "believe the birds."

Green tea for givenness isinglass window old stove fish glue on my shoe held sole to body.
Things tend to come loose.
The last, the shell
our tender shape requires—sympathy is so hard,
we renew the places
where once we were sought, found or not found,
the smell of that rock
thrills us still, identity rediscovered on the desert's edge—it will be hot today.
Time to read another woman's book.

The sutures binding belief—what strange notions are in this Chinese fountain pen (Darjeeling, 1983, ten rupees)
the violet ink releases.
We are weird people
and we need weird things
to help us say our minds.
Not mine. I have nothing to do with all this.
I just write it down.

31 August 2010

Writers just write down what they're told, listening, asking no questions,
just writing it down as it comes.
And so it happens that some writers are like Saint John on Patmos or like Hölderlin and others are like Eichmann just doing his job, regardless of the consequences of what 'they' write.

1.

Always another pen to fill notebook to fill hill to climb up
all for the hard work of climbing down.

To leave what I have written is so hard.
But better leaving than believing it.

Mornings on the sun deck evenings in the summerhouse—you'd think I was made of space!
(In exclamations of that sort the subjunctive is not usually employed.)

Fearless sparrow at my feet.
Under the deck a fat woodchuck comes back to her refuge having eaten the offering cookies thrown.
To be part of the world again eternal, but so brief.

Forest closing kindly around the house
the green protector's arms around us.

How thick the woods
have grown, and close since I moved in four decades back.

Welcome, trees,
I pray you continuance,
shelter for this
halfway hermitage.
