LETTER TO A LOST POET

Once the Thalienstrasse trolley car Took me to the edge of what could be—A long plain street along an elbow of Vienna, city small enough to touch.
And there it was, a jewel of a window,
No, a sky behind a house, a bird come From inside the sky to falter here Down around the ankles of the town, it Was anything at all, the common skin—I'm trying to tell you everything's body.

But why that car? So ordinary a street, Extraordinarily ordinary, the way dirt
Is on a sidewalk or a bird, any bird, Nipping down from the air. An old drunk Passed out across the aisle, slumped Over his brown paper bags, could he keep Them from falling all over, spilling, Getting lost? Can we keep anything From losing? Can I find you again?

A long street of ordinary stores. This Could be anywhere, that's what made it Here especially, why I loved it.
That I could ride through the seeing Only seeing, unchallenged by the names Of things, anyplace is not an easy Place to be, shriek of grey light and steel wheels.
But why tell you? You could have been there Beside me but you were not. You chose,
And choosers belong to their choices, like Trolleys to their gleaming tracks embedded In cobblestone and asphalt all the way To the end of the line. The city passed us On its way to green hills I never did So should have nothing to tell you about Yet I do, from color and shape I make Enough sense to tell you my lies, music
To punish you for your truth, the austere Logic of your quiet final breath.

Who was the old drunk and why should I care?
Could have been me or my father or yours
Or some fallen bishop from the colonies, Poor man fragrant with self-loathing, mumbling In smelly dialect, shifting bundles And finally getting out as if he, even he, Had somewhere to go to and meaningfully be.
What am I getting at, you'll wonder, and why Do I keep blaming you. It takes time To punish the dead for desertion, Forgiveness comes not prompt to the bereaved,

Red robins on the hill right now, new grass Trying to fetch me back from Viennese.
All right, Sun. All right, Wednesday, your eyepatch Slipping out of place lets too much light in Baffling the measure. You hurt my eyes.
Like crying without the tears. Stupid spring,
As if again could ever come again.

Anyhow, a drunk old man is just one Little boy mumbling in his sleep, a drunk Old man is all alone. Nobody Is loner than an old drunk man. An old Drunk man is like a trolley car mostly Obsolete. Soon there'll be no old men left, No drunks, no tracks in the tired streets—Auden rode this way sixty years ago,
But he wanted to be modern, up to date With talk of Spain and atom bombs and Freud
When now for all his twenty million murders Stalin seems as quaint as Tamerlane.
And none of them will ever wake again
No matter what the robins symbolize Outside. I'm stuck with who I am, alas, And who you were. Maybe a little bit I can take you over now, remake you In my mind so you'll be mine – you never Were – for the first time. A score I looked at Now suddenly some pianist actually plays All the way through, fast and true, and that Is finally you. I never knew you.

Something speaking.
A cup. Something Listening. A spoon.
Who knew

you needed more.
Needed me.
The shadow of a steeple is all and a street a street. We thought we had it for sure.

Something in the cup or on the spoon balanced, tipped into the mouth

like somebody's bread. The wine.
Everything is answer enough.

But then where would we entirely be if there were a we to be it there or anywhere, given the dragon nature of the world, all in and out, fire into water, earth into air and never?

What does it mean to pray to the moon?
Do you see it out your window then say it, five days old, weltering in the west like a foundering canoe, pray to it or pray for it, and you, you, what do you make of all this talk, don't you know that when I met you I found you far away in the sky already in the springtime of my need already there and how are you now? Somehow whatever you are has to do with the moon.
I pray to it like an empty bowl, a tin can rolling down the road just out of town.

Trying not even to like what came before me, all my Bellini still to be composed and my voice to be all those voices give me God something to do.

Denkbild. Enter the supreme Dragon, the one inside the air beyond the air.

Denkbild. an iron age becomes beyond itself—wait, I felt with my hands for her, then, only then, discovered that she was pure number.

But what does water remember?
Do we suppose the ocean remembers – with pleasure or remorse – all the waves it propagated or endured?

Two women sleeping each other.
Hunting horn. The forest starts here, especially a line of shadow shunted through lines of light falls here, across them.
Will nothing wake them?
Speak the horn again.

AT RHINECLIFF STATION

1.

The forest starts up there.
I see the edge of it along the hills, the outcry of geology against the sky.
The mountain.

So hard to stand alone with the human senses.
We put them on like a pair of pants too tight.
Come night, we'll take them off.
And then we'll see. Be seen.

ON THE DAY 5-SNAKE

Looking at a snake you'd think: how hard it must be for them to help other people. They seem streamlined to engorge other people of various sizes. A moving mouth. Thinking that way, you come to imagine that there must be other ways, magical or unseen ways, by which the serpent is able to practice compassion and helpfulness towards other people, which are the two root virtues of the world.

From such thinking, you come to imagine that serpents, who have sacrificed so much in their evolution (think of giving up one's arms, one's legs, one's fingers even that create or caress), must have won through that immense austerity great magical or psychic power. You think: they are Nagas, dragons, beings of immense wealth and wisdom, custodians of might and imagination.

You think about how helpful people like dogs are, and cows, and sheep, and birds of all kinds. Yet the serpent is among that small family of people called Sacred Animals in every culture – sacer means holy and unholy both, powerful, set apart. The snake is the most apart of all, and we revere or worship it in rites more nocturnal than the others. In its apartness, it teaches us to be apart-people too, apart and quiet and quick. And wise.

In our wisdom, then, we learn to think our way into the realm where the snake means well, means very well. Because we can mean well even without meaning it or knowing it. We mean well because that is how we are made. People help people. The lion leaves scraps for the hyena, who leaves some for the vultures, who leave some for the insects and the worms and things I have never seen and whose names, alas, I have forgotten. But them too. And they do all this without discussion. The agreement is in our flesh. We are the contract of which we're made.

Thinking like this, you might think the snake the custodian of that profound compact. Kindness is built into the world. It is our task, the snakes' and ours, to find it. Invent it. Make it be.

Then you remember Nagarjuna, the great Indian philosopher, who traveled down under the sea to teach logic to the king of the Nagas, who repaid him with the immense trove of teachings called The One Hundred Thousand Line Treatise on Transcendental Wisdom, and many others besides. Nagarjuna's name means either Conqueror of the Nagas or the Conqueror who is a Naga. When Nagarjuna came back from the sea, he had much to teach. But the kernel of it, or the jewel around which all the rest was wound like ruby in the coils of a serpent, was compassion, the wish that all people be free of suffering, and helpfulness, the wish that all people be happy.

We have given the snake a lot of work to do. And to teach us to do, in our turn. To have such power, and go about our business meaning well, as ill-equipped as we are.

Could I be near this place and hold the hand it has?

Biography is river, everybody's life is a myriad already, as many lives he hath as readers of his book, we confer immortality by accident, o the reader is a quiet god,

a deep rememberer,

something poltroon about it, the dropped book, the tea stain on the title page, something angelic, the phrase
held in mind

forever after, an angel is a message
held in mind
or else the mind
that holds it,

look it up,
some book
dares to tell you.

I mean the actual life, the spear hurtling through the ardent air, each one of us hard as we can inventing the hand that threw it,

the hand from which we're thrown.

Ce que je dis ne me change pas.

—Paul Eluard

All these words we keep repeating, is it God speaking to us sleepers bible after bible babbled out between one nightmare and the next, REM states, somniloquent.
Then the dreamless answers.

A SIGN

How long do you think it will be before the heron weary of staring at itself in the calm pool of the stream looks up and flies fast diagonally through hemlock trees into the mere sky? Long life and patient appetite. Blue shadow quenched in running water.
