Being close to what isn't even there, with wings, celebrating mysterious arrivals like words that suddenly come to mind or robins that at this season, confused by the cold light, flash egregiously close to moving cars, a flash of ruddiness on the windshield, gone, they're safe but what was the message they splayed, phone rings I answer I listen I talk I listen some more I hang up I forget it's all some bird flickering past as if the whole world rubbed its eyes and saw those whirling lights Gerrit tells me are called phosphenes he says make spirals but I never saw anything but distant stars blue as Jupiter on the Tarot card, a sleeping man of middle years, strong, his chest heaving quietly in dream.

POEM BEGINNING WITH A MISREADING of & for George Stanley

That's when you realize your brain is not you, not you or George Starkey or Edward Kelly who also are you, and often not you, and the brilliant wind slices the meager uplift of the new blue-eyed squills on our frozen lawn, Squilla siberica as like as not, but who can tell, cultivars make little histoires of their own, so this stuff keeps coming up to be remembered an insistent mid-morning headache for which no aspirin of focused forgetting has ever been patented, this glass
that has no sides from which I must drink, borneless, the battle.

2.

Or encased in startlement how the ferry churns an affable wake reluctant to leave shore so half an hour along the sea you look back to find an ever-widening triangle expanding its limbs to embrace your origin, something like that, a boat, a sea, a wind fresh in every sense invades your skin and that's not how coffee is supposed to taste and this piece of bread is not the real bread and that steeple fanging up from the peninsula is not the real church not the real people the real people are the gulls you think and you are wrong.

So wrong. Wrong as a boat can be.

3.

So that too is a kind of smattering of it, guesses and soft leather shoes, Mexican word, can't get it now, a pulpit to declare out loud and to a self-appointed rabblement my musical confusions, listen!
Or espadrilles. Canvas snug on Paul Blackburn's feet.

But music keeps saying it, what.
But we keep listening, who.
But they keep explaining, why.
But questions fall from the sky.
There are two creatures in this jungle:
Me and I. Must escape them with my life.

Sometimes the word wakes up first, sometimes the man. Then how alone.
Morning is. Unspecified.
Clouds, but they could be on their way anywhere else. Nothing is here.
To be silent is a sin, a salvation.
Bricklayer logic rules his life.
One more, one more until the sky.
Or something falls. Sometimes it does fall. Sometimes though it is just gone when he wakes up.

BETWEEN THE DUELLISTS

Stop the bullet in mid-flight and talk to it, talk does wonders and not an animal in sight.

Baby Lead, let it pass this time.
Miss. Let the bumptious scoundrel or the wounded paramour escape unscathed this once. Nobody has to die to prove you can kill.

Spend your targetry in pure flight, escape into the experienced air and spend yourself till you fall quiet, cool at last on some nice grass.

A child will pick you up and bring you home, you'll sit on his windowsill and eat the light—Saturn made you for such work as this.

THE QUIET FACE OF SOMETHING GONE

Use easy words to say so the tomato in the butchershop looks sinister, my right hand wants to squeeze it hard shake hands with death for once and look him in the eye, he has beautiful eyes but his hands feel weird, crumbs of every bread you ever ate stick now to his brittle palms.

I want to squeeze that fruit until it bursts all over me somehow healed by its somehow blood.

But here's what they do in other countries: they choose the prettiest girls to be priests and make them live in trees, to each tree an owl, each owl trained to speak one cheerful psalm.
Then every morning the people come and stand worshipful at the tree's base, looking up into that mixture of girl and song and weather which is all these simple people know of the world.
The rest of the day priests wander as they please.

All the places that I've been this life now I understand there's only been one place ever that I've been, standing near the white stupa at Sherab Ling staring up past the golden spire at the blue sky.
Spring in the foothills. Purple jacaranda blossoms and on the far peaks snow. Down below is Bajnath, big town, with the old Hindu temple full of monkeys color of the stone they live on, where Tilopa used to sit all day long grinding sesame seeds on a big stone metate I bent down and pressed by head against, hoping to have squeezed out of me every image but this. The quiet stone.

Can't we make love into the simplest fold like the linen unwrapped from the risen one laid aside, can't we make love and lay love aside and lie beside the only one we mean to say when it is the only and we fold into place as if we were our very selves who do this thing only selves can do and you would be me?

This is half the house I meant to make, a snowflake settling down to earth not landed yet all the time in the world to make contact and none made, all the skin in the world to press together with some other and none found.
When the snowflake falls against the hellebore's white greenish flower suddenly it's done.

But what was happening there the blue thing the thing with holes in it light showed through was it a thing or was it a place could we go?

Could we go?
Silk flowers tin buckets dry.
Dry savages waiting in the sea.
I saw the reef again and it was me.

So forth. The film you never saw, starring Rge Esire and Oft Welt. Lived there for time.

Time is all they had there, did you?
Speechifying politicians with pompadours were not the worst of it the worst was affable blondines with rigid ambitions but flexible views. The news.

but what kind of time is it, like grass or stone, blood or bone or is it liquid in a different way like ancient Roman grass still a little green still flowing a millimeter in a century like earth like us don't think

I was born when I was born I have another skin at home a flag a pedigree a bowl of coins from a country that has never been, the eyes of my mother silent as a church in summer the stiff air the warmth the polished wood.

Like a wake in almost total darkness after dreams of a royal wedding where we, in dream's bright somehow, were friends of the pretty young queen-to-be hence honored guests among the hundreds of.
And there we were in Heathrow waiting the planes to take us in the full round of the royal progress—hearing the weather reports hurricanes all over the world especially here and Europe, everywhere in fact, the young Queen said with a smile, everywhere but where Robert wants to be, at home. America in peace.
And at the moment the doorbell rang three times to wake me and I rose. 4:38 AM and no one there.
In what country did those bells ring?

Walking around the house in darkness fearing who might be there, outside pressing on the glass to see me, or inside already, always, quietly keeping out of my path, noisy footsteps of an old house.

Where was this fear waiting to which I succumb, now, sheltering in the littlest light, every sound a rat scratch in the walls or worse?

I think I have faltered in my practice.
The poem, only the poem counts!
Serves. Serves you. And saves me from the terrible silence where bells ring only I can hear and no one comes.

The scrape of pen on paper terrifies me quietly.
(Old Indian fountain pen I keep dipping in Hilton Weiss's government formula ink made for me a year ago, listen!)

I mean that as an absolute, the sound of word inscribing itself leaving the mind and entering matter, that other kind of mind.

How much did I have to learn to forget so much? O dawn, please come, talk to me in the persuasive rhetoric of light.
What is this fear? What makes me think I am entitled to this terror?

“Night Thoughts” come later.
What it is that comes before thought?
Fear.

Fear is the beginning of language, wisdom’s house built of the parts of speech.

So many books in the spare bedroom they could make a bible of me yet.
Guest room, I call it. But who is here?

12/13 April 2007

Cauldron of plenty.
From which worry comes and brute anxiety.
And each warrior is stuck with the single dread his fork makes contact with and he hoists out.

Could there be another me here who woke me,
who stands at my side?
