IN RECOLLECTION

for Charlotte

Turn off the sun
there are sacred answers to be done man's work or need fire

     a blame

of virgins spun across the oak branches fresh sallowed for spring

Where does the rose come from that has so much red night?
I woke there late afternoon and hugged the light

tried to work my body into it.

SEAPLANE

The moon's interminable solo is something to listen to all through the doubt. I have to be quiet about how difficult it really is to understand what I wrote down, meaning no more than beauty and music and facing both with an awed desire that bubbled up as language easy as sin. Sometimes I wonder.
A day will come we'll see the earth at least some islands of it from the middle of the blue-green air and you'll ask the pilot to skim low over the lepers' graves and ruined dock and the quarry in deep shadow that looks like a cathedral inside out.
NORTH OF MOUNT MANSFIELD

How far have they come from the animal the grace of being beholden to a piece of wood or a store in East Calais, Vermont where they sold cheese off the wheel twenty five years ago and still I haven’t learned how to ski, assuming it can be learned and isn’t just natural like sweating in summertime or falling downstairs when drunk. There are men (mostly) who teach the shapes of poems as if you could carve an egg from the outside and find a living chick inside. Not so. It grows from inside out. Like the taste of cheese from the angel of cow’s milk, or grass from red earth, or this meager sonnet for my wife.

A hero an Achilles no stronger than his teeth a car no further than its tender pneus —we are beset with our root nature and we cringe

I can't go out the door without coming back in twice yea thrice for some forgotten needment key or coin or cup or document trumps of my scattered deck I carry butterfingered into mortal fray.

Don't say you'd rather be a seagull.
All that flying.
Above a world of food hidden in movement.
Don't say you'd rather be the sun.
All that sleep.

The fierce yellow dandelions on the lawn change color when I close my eyes.

The elusive outfield where the ball drops fair

& no one is there to spare the runner or save him from the golden light that knows all our dreams dragons shames furtive sharings songs.

SUNDAY MORNING

for Charlotte

Caught in the complex necessity to be simple he pauses in sunlight.

This is like summer.

Five purple finches eat seed.

It sounds like thunder.
No one awake.

Oriel eye in the ruined house grey on the brow of a hill woodchuck woodchuck quiet here late sunlight in the Word Perfect character set we find the Macedonian soft k—what shall we do with all our differences o Angel of Language you tight-skirted girl?

That the outside is a way and the mind-in-me whoever you are craves light and this light is silence and the bear whose bones are made of stars falls forward on four paws to hold this earth his sudden prey

I am. Howler-monkey in the cloud bitter lamp to show the dark its own svelte motives.
Why am I a forest?

And who are you who play chess with the sun?
Who are you who move your houses like someone else's big flat feet over the green permission we call Earth?

Moieties, the brown.
Midnight, the ships bowed like the new moon it is over the wave-fangs seeking imputed souths.
The carriage, the charioteer of uncertain gender and godly eyes, the buoy in the channel, the grail squirreled away in the moon, the same place the light doesn't actually come from however much we see it so.

Safe landing, argosies!

The condiments from Fauchon, the peppercorns white green red & black from the vague islands we used to own, and ruled from Gaul.
Islands where the Priestess sends the dead.
Islands where they scratch their alphabets against the summer skies at night so their words come back forever subtly repronounced by weather over the angelish channel between us and the lowest heaven where language can be hardly heard.

But the letters of the world came before language, the beechen book staves stammered before speech, when all we heard shivering by the water was a little vibration, maybe, as if something meant something else, the kind of shake a poor old cobra might perceive and raise himself up to dance in all the cruel markets of exploitation before the white man lost his wrist watch in the crowd.

THE FIRST BOOK OF NUMBERS

The divisors of reality the murk waiting at the end of sunset to eat the mountain and and and the halfmoon caught in the branches of an oak unfledged by spring

catch me these are the triads of my weasel-welsh my spur off Caer Idris and a spoiled senator waiting for his grapes to come back from the mouths of women as words. As words we live and as silence we lie down under the stone and say why.

2.

What does it mean to say a number say a number to a woman like a quince

not yet flourishing and suddenly what I thought was one has thorns

it is another and what does it mean to say a number when whenever there is counting there is a mystery something clear and something not a river.

Say a river.
What does it mean to say a river to a woman, a number pours forever and forever

I think that's what it means.

3.

What is this thought of numbers this cascade of unrelentingness begun when a tongue

or when it says whatever it says and that is city

enough for the likes of me to infest with my unending sense of streets the salmon of the story tastes the wit ever after and all he knows is where we go I read that book on the subway in the grid of numbers absolutely going

nowhere to reflect or recollect the simple passage

reading a book and being young and being in a tunnel under the river.

But there is something there to catch to spite the light a glimpse of darkness hidden in the count like an albino buffalo in a snowstorm guessing at the north the house where the stars come from that is the city again our guesswork

the only philosophy west have left it suffices

to eat lichen from under the snow to moss.

A crow is a cat in a tree.

The day has already begun.

Now what?
Your friend is your wife.

Some dried red roses she gave you fresh rest scarlet atop the Indian accordion whose busted bellows in this bright sun are lenten purple and a dream of flowers.

Again
I have inherited my life.

Because nothing is happening in the happening because the golden sunlight of a million English books is scattering my poor cold spring into wish and reminiscence re-dogs hopes and fears a person at the door inculcating Woe

there is the wished-for silence and the spiræa I wonder how it will do this year when last was a foam of love tossed up everywhere and all of this is just some time that’s travelled from one part of the mind to another to flee from imputation.

Polygala is I think the name of a flower like a goose in flight or an airplane or those are the resemblances I remember. That and its hot pink on a mossy cliffedge over a waterfall when the woman was very far.

12 May 1992
Here they are waiting for the character that will change their lives the blue thorn pressing in from a manuscript

a rune of clouds rimming her head and you pray to her because it has been said.

The bible is her shadow and the nest of her breeds the savage crows that fly up in my face when I get between her and the truth.

The champions of it wait in their bistros bothering decent people from Detroit who do not ride up in gilded cages at the Willard to ballrooms with the topbrass of the UAW this is simple as grass I'm trying to explain it to myself like a house or Buddha talked about a house on fire and a certain king or merchant with children trapped inside who would not leave until they heard of his white horses elephants oxen snuffing in his safe outdoors

--the real benefits of imaginary animals by whom we are recruited to the dance.

And these villains snuggle up to bars and write checks in antique shops and make the decent people of Detroit wish for one red afternoon in Washington to see justice done.

But justice is not for the doing.
Justice is a white horse just beyond our burning door.

That it is mathematical and a game that it is a problem in the state that borders on the mind and flows it scrubbing it like Mexican washermen in the Los Angeles river there are places where the beginning is still trying to begin.

That it is susceptible to analysis is our grief. That we believe our reckonings sinks the ship of the mind time after time.
The shape of the mind.
Number is our white whale.

And you won't believe me. You go right on in the heart of the glorious insertions.
Touch me was the other things I was going to say.

Evening the wind from shore shears away from us, the seaplane is flying low into the sunset that is Massachusetts but the wind from us carries the sound away into the land before us. It is still and a bird hangs fire at the top of the sky. Imagine it like this. I do. The trees of the island are low and few. Beyond them a barge is creaking up against its pier too amorously for me not to get ideas. I think it will be like this where we are when there is here. The island and the evening. Tall-masted Shenandoah white in the outer harbor. Ducks drift in the soup of the sea.

THE SCREEN

The geometric lines constantly changing their colors in the screen-saver pattern leave an afterglimpse of words when they pass through each other, shadows inside shadows, on the way of change. Nested in movement, these multiple contours insinuate a meaning gone when I focus clearly on where the words had been. What words? In the south or in the north, the moon or the river, man or the flower, our ordinary lives. Telling what? Telling me to change. The lines that led to me have gone on long enough, I am an apparent pause in their meaning. Not different from that. Gone by the time you look. I remember myself the way you recall a long-dead friend, someone interesting, something nice about him, out of touch, worth a pause and then back to work watching the computer play.

Is it the smell of someone's mind you remember the feel in the kitchen when they sat and talked and picked at things or rubbed breadcrumb into a little ball on the glass table and spoke about the weather loyally like someone keeping troth with a wife.
You wish you could hear them complaining.
It is so hard for you to trust anyone, let alone a friend.
When you’re married to the world everything that happens is your business and the one thing you can't do is tell lies.
That's why you let your hands remember.

I wanted to be small to waste the sunlight on finding me

I wanted to hide inside your skin until I found me

I wanted the milk and then the wine and then the water

I watched the woods
I watched the roads until they ran

I wanted to be one and then another one wanted to be me

I wanted to disappear into the smile of city people seeing things
