House of Heather

Lili Coyote Kies
lk0608@bard.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.bard.edu/senproj_f2019

Part of the Arts and Humanities Commons

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-No Derivative Works 4.0 License.

Recommended Citation
https://digitalcommons.bard.edu/senproj_f2019/57

This Open Access work is protected by copyright and/or related rights. It has been provided to you by Bard College's Stevenson Library with permission from the rights-holder(s). You are free to use this work in any way that is permitted by the copyright and related rights. For other uses you need to obtain permission from the rights-holder(s) directly, unless additional rights are indicated by a Creative Commons license in the record and/or on the work itself. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@bard.edu.
Memories, customarily illusory, often get retired— but not discarded— into our lightless closets where other defunct things go, warping in the dark. Other times memories resurrect and become glinting trophies and souvenirs. Even the most vivid memories are doomed to a process of revision, a reconciliation between an event and the passage of time, an inevitable obfuscation of truth. A photograph is a tactile memory? This immanent, natural quality of memory nevertheless sparks off a suspenseful tale which bobs ambivalently between different methods of representation toward some mysterious end. When someone tells you a memory the unknowable amount of times that they’ve told it, it’s probably so amended that you are nodding on to nothing. It is embracing this dilemma, this slippage, the impossible distance between a memory and the real thing that is of interest to this work. This is a “landscape project without being in the landscape” project. These pictures have fun making obvious their own artifice, exercising a faithlessness to place, time, reality. It is unshakable, sometimes, that photographs let you hold memories. They are wary of the photograph as record, and even more specifically, the photograph as something transparent, unaffected by the command of who takes it. Memories make their own gospel. A memory is like a coin flipping over and over again in the air.