THE MESSENGERS

And then we were home a bird looking in the window, ghosts, half alive already where men live, real men whatever they really are, you read about them in fairy tales, they live a year and a day and their house sails out to meet them runs along the side of the road.

The house had us. Strange to be swallowed by miracle, curious holy rabbis rearranging vowels as they sat feeding birds under oaks but we hid under beeches laymen full of greedy consonants buck suck truck luck lucre of the mind, we want we want but the beech trees were holy too and made us hesitate smooth bark a girlish tree for all its big and we could sleep beneath the copper leaves a night two nights and reap a dozen dreams sonnets algorithms a weathertop till our words were finished and rain came

A bird looks in the window.

Worry. They see me where I have hidden behind glass. Hidden me and hidden something else. Who can tell what is missing from the world?
This bird on his way to heaven still finds me worth a moment's glance.
Who knows (he thinks) when it will help the Mind to have seen this man.
No one ever knows who benefits, who blesses just by being there.
We help each other through a world without the slightest accident.
Everything means. Everything supports the other.
I would say we are a vine forever except we are the fruit everywhere and the vine nowhere. The bird dignifies me
by his observation.
With me in mind
He came down from heaven.

SYLLABLES

Know them better the beads fall from the old woman's hand history of religion it's the eyes you go by you can tell the god friends from the high ground who teach us to dwell eskenosen set up his tent he amongst us until we were not sure what he was or what we are the confusion is useful fruitful in the year of the fructiferous incarnation we are a current the passes through things lysing them into their differences

their 'selves'

sodium chlorine hydrogen oxygen silly names of our lovers hard to keep from laughing

Monica Miriam Molybdenum

God sent them to wake us or at least teach us a nobler kind of sleep nothing worth convection the broad mortised armoire stillborn from the joiner's sleep I keep a residence down here with cannibals because they love me and all do who take me mortal in no time with convocation though proud morticians are mired stallbound from the jouncing

PROOF BY EXHAUSTION

How close we are to the fact.

Tell me. Why you?

Why does the aqueduct always

Go through your neighborhood

As if the balances of water

Made a special song for you

Rushing by, try to get your attention

So busy dreaming who Am I touching you now?

NIGHT PRAYER

Rosary is an autumn mouth a bare repeating of dry fingers somewhere in the mother tongue a bird the color of its seed trouble heaven with lewd ascensions the clock of ordinary desires another time we work the texture of the word to bring birds down out of the air they fall through the breath of our vowels blue-mouthed reality around the lips your lips saying whatever you choose a little message left at midnight while my memory burrows in your hair.

CAVE

I think it has to be risked. You have to know what I think.
And the thinking is a cave, a slender dark declivity leading in to a much larger place where things happen. Where we do.
You have to know this, to keep me from saying so.

THE HUSBAND

Things are so far.
Who will be me when you're there standing early morning in front of your house when a little mist makes the meadow sea? I want to stand before you always mocking the distances respectful of the small separations you keep in your heart determined not to be me.
For all my travel
I am your home insisting on this stone we share and on it a house and in the house a table our hands join there a glass a book an empty plate a bed in the corner of the room like autumn thunder.

Never too many philosophers, too many midwestern afternoons.

I hear you because of your goodbye so lingering, so drawn to the finest missing a friend under the grey mountain we all climb or try to,

the sound of the prestigious violin silences

but your string sounds something just this side of forever this side, where we can meet, where we can believe all the things we hear in the dark.

(thinking of violist Markka Gustafson's performance at Fred Grab's memorial) who could be the names of these flowers

 a crow takes off from a tree a yellow leaf falls that's who we are

3 September 2002

The road empty shadow across it

telling lies among ruins
I love you

GHOSTS

But who can answer when the rock is sign oxygen hydride waiting below the cliff all these answers turbulent water makes wind wind leaves earth

all that matters listens to me

white veins in red rock spirit house here we keep our ghosts

the ones who died before us yes but also the ones we'll one day be we talk to them now and they listen

the ghost of a dead person is called a spirit the ghost of someone still alive is young and small and often hides inside an element, a piece of tin, an aluminum kettle, this little red stone holds a whole heart.

αγγραφα

this is the unwritten book you hold it in your hands you seem to be reading it but it is not written you think you read it is not written but it is not written Written meant to carve or scratch or scrape, what did reading mean, what kind of wrestling with or wresting out reading now means to write an unwritten text from no words. No.

What is reading?
Read a wordless text into human argument.

You read it but it is not written.
No one said this.

Sometimes be glad alone.

LIFTING THE FLYERS ON A BLUE CURRENT

The naïve animal believes it's me, Sanhedrin among humans, a tree among fowl, where will you go to hear your lover's name accurately pronounced?
That's not your language it's just your tongue and the sounds of Work recede across the muddy colors of the lawn.
Ozone. Giving is care.
Water was so simple once, it's own day, Urina caelestis, the dawn of rain.

I'm hiding you inside my breath he happy in the doldrums of my mouth warm and wet and not much breeze till later, hours into longing, you'll see moonlight's sparkling maybes from the comfort of my caravan.

We will get there. We will conclude a pact with ocean, we will war against stability, we will be dumb as only people stretched out in the sun can be, only a little hurt any more we hurt each other like a crucifixion in a museum all about fiddling and shifting restless, burdened with anxious skills, what a funny looking thing he is, twitching restless fingers eager to do something to something, restless feet all ready to run away, the round head swiveling on its unlikely elevation, like a lantern walking but with such little eyes and still I want to come home with you tonight.
