

11-1994

novC1994

Robert Kelly
Bard College

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.bard.edu/rk_manuscripts

Recommended Citation

Kelly, Robert, "novC1994" (1994). Robert Kelly Manuscripts. Paper 1242. http://digitalcommons.bard.edu/rk_manuscripts/1242

This Manuscript is brought to you for free and open access by the Robert Kelly Archive at Bard Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Robert Kelly Manuscripts by an authorized administrator of Bard Digital Commons. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@bard.edu.

The evidence abounds. Look you, a tattered star, a flock of younglings without a clue, a heavy hammer dropped by a weak father, look you, these are twenty. These are more. Unswift remembrances, thawed darkneses, bleak trains. A picture of a radio in wartime, warming fingers on the bad news.

Mutes found themselves waiting to be still. Dynamite in the woods to ambush us. The excellent pronouns of the mind we think we are. Lancelot through perfect darkness led me and by his breath given or withheld wordless taught my steps to lift or shit. Unstumbling I gained the hill house in her name.

The pot was broken. The fort gaped. Everything was touch, everything knew how to know me in the dark. I heard the owls, they were a kind of priest of it, this thing that knew me till I knew, and Antares was scorching the horizon, beating red.

Things we worry about, the sky. For what covers us also is turpitude and dread, but solemn cold and serious those gases and those glaciers that behold us. They are persons until they do not speak. Listen, the evidence by negation affirms.

18 November 1994

So a month has hurried through my veins and what do you care, fat sun rising on such a different scale I'm done so soon and you keep coming blurting out the yellow facts of life?

At least in cloud a man can think:
There is no shadow. This love is permanent.
The precious homestead of the heart will grow and harvest and the world will stay.

Then you come with your ups and downs and analytic glare, a snarling prefect in the dormitory and we are scattered into separatenesses trapped by the rhythms of photonic information or some big word that means the tyranny of light.

19 November 1994

THE MORNING NEWS

The crows say everything all the sense I'll make today and then some seven big ones right at my door in the bare trees preaching and rearranging the sky the way they do and that's the difference between me and St Francis he preached to the crows they talk to me maybe I can catch a little bit of what he said.

20 November 1994

Things I want for Christmas: a scanner and a morph, a CD-ROM and Hadrian's Wall.
The National Gallery and a sudden squall of snow.

20 November 1994

A mouth in my veins hungry for its proper vocabulary.
Girl grid, spasm of light over the hill. Just drive slow till the road arrives. Hardly anything I can do. As the key said looking at the door. Just this one half-forgotten trick.

20 November 1994

The sheer radians of real-time analysis shimmer interesting allocations through my pie—this much is for the world this much for me a man supposes, gazing past his breath at a winter morning full of big ideas. Measure is so comforting, a scale of values glued to the side of your workplace as continuous reminder of decay, the Renaissance, Albrecht Dürer, high school triumphs of sheer slide-rule dexterity, your old schoolroom globe with analemma you alone could understand, you swell. The difference between Bach and anybody else you guess. Help us in the hour of our need, three voices with only one subject, small skill, cold hands.

20 November 1994

THE WHOLE WORLD TURNS OUT TO BE A PLACE LIKE SPAIN

Trying to hold onto it but it is not there to be touched it is there to be desperate about, not a bus to miss but an ambulance too late, tu sais? It is an area-way under a broken house, a mattress down there and some bags that might be what human life is for, might be Achilles.
There is always a stranger, so much for your roses and Novembers, there is always a foreigner who can do it better and dirtier than you. In grey uniforms they were waiting for some kind of sunrise, blood in it, a truck with a loudspeaker in it carrying the truth for miles I suppose, at least it was our version of what happened, our anthem the band played. I think I came here because someone I loved had come here first.
Then I stayed for the war. The war was enough.
It was close, like mud. It answered every question like wind.

21 November 1994

for Charlotte, on her birthday

I have not said anything for days it is the pleasure of your company that speaks for me, says what I say. You have let me be quiet in you, a part of my mind I never knew

we walk in together in rain, heavy rain at the end of the daylight, I have never been so together. Day by day the perfections come into view,

not like a poem,

not even Aeneas's upriver journey in the hush of an imaginary history where every treebranch trails in this immediate flood. The wet of things goes with us, not like music, not like things even, just this quiet forward breasting through moist time like no particular bird south for no reason.

22 November 1994

Imagine this: first a kitten tumbles out of a nut fell from a tree grew from a fire started when you sat one day began with a phonecall from the president elected as a compromise worked out by diplomats speaking an unknown language downloaded from a newly colonized planet discovered in time for an exile planned for all the excess population excited by the last successful war won by your enemies—what did he say? What will you call the cat?

22 November 1994

POLITICS

When a face is shallow the minted coin loses definition soon.
A wise army knows this and chooses Emperors for their profiles as we, who have lived in this place forever, know to choose wives for their bones, husbands for their bones, guided by the tough lean bone of the wind—a face you can see clear with your eyes half closed.

22 November 1994

for Charlotte

Caught nearby in the solemn speak-to-me of morning I felt your hip land-surge, moon-answerer, rise in the sleep you gave me, architecture of to be together— I have awakened in your city god-like, full of prose adventures that led me to this place. Last night the hunters were at it even at midnight shooting at their shadows in our meek woods.
All of this is built upon the guess, the world is always listening so I woke.

23 November 1994

END OF THE VARIATIONS

1.

Listening to the Bach not brook I hear but those tumultuous silences of a Saxon art spilled (spelled) under hand ¡Mira! the teeth of a piano.

Certainly I saw some glints of snow crossing past me in the hard north wind just now and I'm not even in Paris, not the Marais, not even a broker or a soldier, and still the sky wants

(o so much it wants, the only thing it ever wants) to fall on earth to cover us with its serene implausibility and what am I? a character with dried rose petals on my desk, all right, I'm married, I am a book and a candle maybe, certainly we are composed of ninety percent water (on dit) and ten percent ceremony, a few snow flakes in the dark hedge: Germany.

I was there last year at this hour and it was then too, the year's first snow then too, never get away from now, not with all this music.

2.

Awkward pause while the music ties its shoes—what are we, are we Dacians or some pious barbarians trapped in an overwhelming deity we have to feed coastlines, pine cones, lovers' breath, linden tea, what manner thing can pacify a god and get his sky to sleep —head bent low a passenger goes by crouching into the north wind, it has come again, I'd whistle in it if I could hear, we're thinking in the dark, that's all, and all your sacred Portugals don't help a bit, we're all impostors who turn out to be real but we haven't come yet to that chapter in our book.

This is (je vous assure) what Jean-Sébastien Bach in fact was thinking about while he was setting down the hen tracks on thick paper turn out (three hundred hard winters later) to sound like this. This thing behind my shoulder, this sound effect, this unanswerable complexity feels like somebody's tongue in your mouth of your head.

Relax, siblings, I'm just giving you part of it here.
Later the cathedrals. Later still the 18th Brumaire.

3.

And this is the last part, the slow one, that some call “movement” but I call a quiet searching in your head for a remembered definiteness — a word it might be, or the name of a town you stayed in for twenty minutes while your train paused waiting for the Lyons express to pass. Or a number, one of those numbers smart magazines discuss, odd properties of primes and cubes and Fibonacci series, and you hold your breath, even waiting for the word to come.

It never will. The word is lost and lost forever, a clock ticking under the snow, a palace revolution that flopped before the king woke up.

All things come in threes, all things happen and are lost again into the comfortless sequencer of things, this fate of ours we work so hard to make.
But the word stays lost, whatever you say (you can even say it without finding it) and leaves us with this emptiness the music annotates.

23 November 1994

(Written listening to the last sections of the Goldberg Variations played by Alexis Weissenberg, a tape given me by Pat Meanor.)

As if the other side of the sun (light cavorting on its own, lighting nothing that we are, light en route, light free of commentary, hurrying or idling like Whitman in a summer dream) a solitary idea got trapped in travelling whose thinking is this burning exchange of elemental properties like the wife of a rich man late for the Opera, chemistry does not suspend its operation.

That is the ocean mill, the near-to-hand, tick lurking on a twig, shadow on my hand.
I have named all the apathies of detail—now put the names to sleep and see.

24 November 1994
Thanksgiving

Things find their place.
Not places. The world is singular they fall into.

It might be on Thirst Avenue a performance piece or a man selling knishes in the rain.

The system is strictly without alternatives.

I hope that will be music enough.

25 November 1994
KTC

