CHAIRMAN OF E.P.C. LISTS ACHIEVEMENTS OF COMMITTEE DURING SPRING SEMESTER

I was very pleased when the editors of Bard Week asked me to submit an article stating what E.P.C. had accomplished this term. I feel that since our activities receive much less publicity than those of Council, that the community is at times unaware of our work. I hope that the students and faculty will feel free to offer any suggestions to E.P.C. or to come to any of our open meetings.

At the beginning of the term we helped in the orientation of the students who entered in February.

At the time when the Peis-Koenig affair was first brought to the attention of the community, it was decided that Council and E.P.C. write a joint letter to those professors and to Dr. Fuller asking for more than a "no comment" statement. This was done, and we received a letter from Dr. Fuller which explained his position in the matter. This answer was subsequently posted on the Council bulletin board. Soon after the Council-E.P.C. letter was sent, the notice from Dr. Peis appeared on the Administration board announcing his resignation.

Students for the first time have served as members of the Admissions Committee. Upon two different occasions this semester, Robert Marvin has reported on the work of the Admissions Committee to us.

Another first was the establishment of E.P.C. office hours. This had never been tried before. We found it very successful to have regular hours when E.P.C. members can be found in the Community Government Office so that the student body will have ample opportunity to bring complaints or suggestions to the attention of E.P.C.

But in my breast and in my brain,
Awake the pangs that pass not by,

CONSTRUCTING ATTITUDES AND STANDARDS
by Clair Leonard

I have a rather private feeling (or at least it was private until I decided to write about it in these paragraphs) that although life is no doubt a very serious thing, it can be, and frequently is, taken much too seriously. And to my mind this "serious" attitude toward life becomes strikingly evident in many of the unfortunate things we say or do. Perhaps it is more to what we feel than to what we say or do so often that I am most referring, because what we do is likely to be the inevitable outcome of those other expressions, when it is too late to do otherwise. I am largely concerned, as I gather our difficulties, with our failure to understand one another, to find something in our attitudes that is behind these words.

There are very few of us who have not experienced some kind of disappointment in life, from the minor kind with its temporary emotional hurt to the kind of disappointment that plays a major part in the formation of our whole personality. And I think (continued on page three)

<td>Yes, we've made mistakes. We've failed to cover several important issues and events on campus; our reporting at times has been insecure. We've been sloppy and uncertain. Sloppy because we are new to this work and have not had the facilities to turn out a refined job; uncertain because we've found it hard to know what to recommend—that is, what tone or mood we should try to set. We are less uncertain now. The theatrie, immaturity, poor manners, anger, and bitterness of the past few months, which came to a head last week in the educational panel on administration, has made us certain that a tone of calm discussion, self-searching, and objectivity must be established here. We hope that the BARD TIMES will help set such a tone, retaining its right to criticize, but always with alternatives in mind and in a mood of friendliness, not vindictiveness. We thus have three major aims:</td>

(We shall not attempt to cover every little happening, but rather the events that will have only vaguely heard about and should therefore be brought into actual contact with.) To feel that too much here is ruined and made sick by rumor and distortion that this coverage perhaps can prevent such situations. Our goal will always be to appear weekly.)</td>

Our paper can be a useful agent in achieving this kind of Bard.</td>

It is within the confines of compact college communities like ours where this devastating kind of disappointment, so ruinous to personal happiness, is most perceptible. We have been idealists, by our very nature, and with an idealist anything short of perfection can breed cynicism, bitterness, and even some of the most distressing of personal maladies.

Our recognition of our disappointments, even as we with a perfect sense of righteousness blame somebody else for their cause. Our reasoning compels us, as a matter of consequence, to trace our shortcomings and our failures to the influence of our disappointments, and in fact some of us devote a great deal of thought to making the friend good where he is poor. That we fight against is a confession, especially an open one, of our shortcomings and failures; we talk great pain to hide there, sometimes with considerable skill and grace, but at other times in most awkward and unattractive ways. Demonstrations of the letter sort are sometimes packed with emotion, and can have, according to the power of the individual practicing them, a most dangerous and far-reaching effect. I am convinced, moreover, that the effects of such demonstrations are no less dangerous to the individual practicing them than to those against whom they are directed.

One frequently hears such aphorisms as: an undertaker is a disappointed surgeon; a neurotic is a disappointed pianist; a critic is a disappointed creative artist; etc. I would prefer not to agree with such patronizing sentiments, holding, as I do that each of these "substitute" professions has considerable dignity of its own. Certainly, too, there must be a great deal more satisfaction to be found in being a neurotic than in being an undertaker.

Our ideas of standards and our ideas of happiness have a direct bearing on each other. Our consciousness of having failed, or even (without completely failing) of not having attained the perfection which we held upon as a time dreamed for ourselves, is bound up with our conception of not losing face. Our failures and shortcomings are curiously bound up with society, and with the competition with which it requires us to participate in—or at least so we think. But since our disappointments, to which we trace our shortcomings are not the concern of society, and since by the ruler of society we feel compelled to pass first, our only way out seems to be to go to the next astounding length to apply the most arbitrary standards in our judgment of the accomplishments and conduct of others! I am thinking of the most extreme cases among us as I make this observation, for it goes without saying that all of us are forced in all circumstances of our lives to pass judgment at one time or another, as an aid to our as well as ourselves in making choices. As to the flexibility of the standards which we apply in making our fairest judgments, I know no other guide than our own consciences.

Those who suffer from disappointment can find our tried and true help for their sense of inferiority: the great "safety-valve" known to us is that with which to escape. To the German nation as a whole lacking; it is what excessive emotions and nations who "can't afford to lose face" lack; it is what any competitors in the competition of the business and professional world lack, both as corporations and individuals; and it is the prerequisite in the practice of much professional or even non-professional sport. It is what members of many racial minorities have to a remarkable degree, as they have learned its importance to their mental well-being. It is that many of the smaller nations of the world have learned to adopt and practice, like Sweden who gave up conquest a century ago, and like Italy, since the war, abandoning her dreams of empire.

We must learn to accept ourselves, with all our shortcomings, because of this attitude can develop a true and natural growth toward concrete tangible ideals within the reach of us all. There will be many of us, as we all understand, whose worrisome achievements can be measured in terms of absolute standards, when the rest of us hold in the highest esteem, and who, because they are really great, practice their talents magnanimously, and not with scorn for their inferiors. It is to those few (very few indeed), the select, the chosen, to whom the path toward greatness seems to be indicated and therefore built up to give that role and all its complicated attendant responsibilities, even as the rest of us accept the varying limitations of our own minor roles with equally calm assurance and pride.

In view of the well-known deficiencies of the Drama Department, the production of 'Tonight at 8:30' was exceptionally good. It represented part of the Senior Project work of Susan Core in acting, Richard Sherman in original music and lyrics, Dolores Keenmer in acting, and Martha Becker in acting and costume construction.

The production as a whole lacked the rapidity and sparkle of Pool Coward works. The actors did, at times, attain this quality, as in the scene between Jay Smith and Judy Sherman in 'Shadow Play', and in William Pitkin's scene in 'The Most Dashing'!

Sue Core, who chose this production for her Senior Project did an admirable job on an extremely difficult task. She carried four completely separate leads, and had to change character and mood between each short play. With the exception of 'The Most Dashing', in which she misinterpreted a sophisticated and mature character as a most and silly one, she was excellent. In 'Still life', where it was necessary to change fromoods and feelings of great happiness to worry and frustration, she lived up the highest of expectations. Her gay and dance routines with Bob Smith in 'Red Peppers' were authentic and fast moving if not inspired.

Richard Sherman's words and music defy criticism. They are magnificent. Such love songs as 'Above the Stars' and 'This Was Not Something New', and such novelty songs as 'I'm Easy to Please', and 'Things That People Call LAZZ', are not merely exceptional as Senior Project work; they are equal to and above many of the most popular show music of our time.

The execution of these songs by Sue Core, Jack Madonna, Bill Pitkin, Joel Fields, Bob Smith, and Bill Kramer, in most cases, did the justice. Sue Core and Jack Madonna sang with exceptionally pleasing sensitivity.

Dolores Keenmer, in two comedy roles, was her usual riotous self, bringing out not only the coarse but the subtle humor in her characterization. Martha Becker, in one comedy role, was adequately amusing. Outstanding among the supporting performances was Olga Church, who, as usual, gained a real appreciation of the weight of her lines and portrayed, and conveyed her impressions to the audience with facility.

Sue Fielder, in two fine roles, played them for all they were worth, which in this case was a great deal. This was certainly her best dramatic work and probably his best performance thus far at school. Ken Archer was more than capable as the frustrated theater manager. His lines moved nicely. The remainder of the cast, as well as the set and lighting, were reasonably good.

Perhaps the most glaring single error in this production was in the blocking of 'The Most Dashing'. Many effective lines were lost because of awkward positions and unwisely moved. On the other hand, the direction of 'Shadow Play' by Al Killenbeck was beautifully done.

The Departments of Music and Drama are to be congratulated on this production. Directed and acted by students with supervision by the instructors, it was far above many previous offerings.

"With convertibles opening like canvass jack-in-the-pulpits in blossom, Jardinien the chorus over have been assured that "summer is sprung in," While the first reaction to this crysickly scene may be, "here does an alien go so to bed," the second is sure to be a perusal of want-ads for a summer job. To present below a survey of positions secured by ambitious Jardinian in search of (or, sometimes, in lieu of) summer work.

Robert Farlee will stay in innamable, selling (at a nominal cost) boxes of inflammable refuse for people to store in attics and basements. The purpose, revealed Chief Farlee, is twofold: to gather revenue for the department, and to give the boys a chance to spend their loneliness at interesting blazes.

More than one graduating psych major will spend his summer at hard work, trying to reduce the "psychiatrist's swamp" which comes from writing long senior projects while tended beside a loaded couch. Analysis, like travel, seems to be broaching.

I hesitate to mention the last, and perhaps most exciting summer role that was unfolded to us during my investigation. I was at a notorious local cabaret, sitting my stoolie across the table from a hard sociomet. Shielding his twisted, evil face, the desperate confided to me: "This summer I'll start work on my senior project, a year ahead of time!"

I recoiled at the enormity of what he had said, ran along the wall like a rat, and before I could recover, he was gone into the murky night.

Liaison has been obtained with the Trustees and the Faculty Policy Committee. The Trustees now have a regular chairman of their Educational Policy Committee, and she has been contacted on two occasions. The Faculty Policy Committee has instructed Dr. Garrett to transmit to us those parts of their minutes which they designate for this purpose. Thus, we hope that the two committees can combine their efforts when both are concerned with the same matters. We have been instructed by the Faculty Policy Committee to look up and administer a questionnaire, and we asked for more cooperation from the faculty in turning in absence notices, there have been a few chronic 'repeaters' among the student body.

Concerned over the deficiencies of the library as a place for studying, E.P.C. received permission to have Orient opened for such purposes, and information to this effect was publicized.

Several of our members have served on various important committees. Two students were active on the committee which revised the criteria sheet. We have been also represented on the body which is examining the structure of our community government. Our Absentee Committee has formulated a new policy for handling cuts from class. Though we have asked for more cooperation from the faculty in turning in absence notices, there have been a few chronic "repeaters" among the student body.

Council was petitioned by several members of the community to investigate the possibility of offering a course in radio next year. This matter was referred to E.P.C. which let interested members draw up and administer a questionnaire. The results were submitted to E.P.C. and were the topic of discussion between our committee and the Faculty Policy Committee. It was decided that a radio course was not feasible at this time, but a committee is being organized to study the possibilities of integrating Radio Bard into the academic spheres of the college.

E.P.C. was also disturbed at what we felt was a misinterpretation of the "What we're Up To" statement. To clarify this, two authors of the article submitted letters to us, one which was published as a supplement to the Bardian. The other will appear as part of our minutes on the Council Bulletin Board.

At a meeting earlier in the term, we investigated the Student Employment Evaluation Sheets. We heard complaints from various students and from Dr. Robinson learned the true nature of these sheets, and found to what use they were put. Our findings were reported in the minutes of that meeting.

The tabulation of the questionnaires given out to the students last term for their remarks in evaluating the teaching methods of their instructors was completed, and hours were held in the Community Government Office so that individual faculty members could obtain the results. A genuine interest was found among the faculty. If possible, we would like to set up machinery to make this a regular practice.

At a special meeting we decided to send the results of the questionnaires of Mrs. Grayson, Dr. Beis, and Dr. Koenig to the Trustees, Administration, and to the Faculty Policy Committee as one more criterion to be considered in any decisions these groups might make. It was felt the results were valid, since the questionnaires were given out before any of the present difficulties arose.

A sub-committee of E.P.C. has finished its work on a questionnaire which it is hoped will become a regular part of the evaluation given to faculty members. That remains to be done now is to submit the questionnaire to the proper channels for approval or suggested changes.

These are our accomplishments this semester. Discussions of many other points were held but were not important enough to warrant mention. I would like to say that I and every member of E.P.C. are ready and eager to receive comments, complaints, or suggestions from any member of the community.
