NIETZSCHE’S TYPEWRITER

The over, the over the licit, the everlasting beginning beginning

“a fruit falls from no tree and becomes me”

Schreibkugel.
It is Nietzsche’s typewriter a bowling ball with eyes a Cavaillon melon from Provence grown between sunflowers whose Fibonacci seeds count out the syllables of God and the Roman road to Spain, a single fruit studded with alphabets “I hold my brain in my hands now and press my keys, I scribe, I describe,
I lick skin, I lock and I unlock the world,

I fall apart, I run to seed myself, unself me, and you are what becomes of me”

Any book is a pudding of words, it is thick,
it sickens us.
Every book you ever opened is somehow still in you now, subtle-thick, cells-impeding. your neurons replete with its meanings

all of them trying to love you at once.

For any alphabet is an orgy, everyone with everyone, an army of pyramids upside down coming over the desert towards you trying to right themselves in you, what is a poor machine to do, o let me stand upright in you!

He wrote a poem on a machine, it rhymed with iron it rhymed with glass he squeezed it between his hands to make it squeak, squeal, the door creaks as it swings open by its own no-self and the night sings

and no one stands there gibbering articulate, squeezing a machine in her no-hands because she has language too at last we let us hear timor mulieris initium moriæ between her slender fingers dancing on the machine careful of the chasm between the keys down there where there are no words and still the humans feel and need, “o sparrowcraft come teach me lift to hear the missing lady found only among us, sprawling out new alphabets—gleam of thigh, glint of teeth” do you miss the sound of typewriters chattering in the Massachusetts night?

“I’ll tell you what it means: it means what comes to mind when it happens—what more could a brass clock do in a world without time?”

They say the brain healthy or diseased is like a pudding in which events take place, structures, functions, who can tell?

Events that sometimes make you think something has changed (but how can there be change when there is no time? only change of seeming, change of feeling, the brain is a change machine, it is the proprietor of what is new,
the womb it is of the not-yet, a wet womb floating in a northern pelvis, that bowl of bone with eyes, “o rest your weary head and weep for the miseries of all beings, the mad man beating the old man beating his horse.”

MANIFESTO

Let it try as hard as it can it will still be earth, we’ll still breathe weather, and the Latin plainchant of the marsh frogs no Pope can interfere with, no council modernize. The robins also, hiding most of the winter, can come out and flirt now, that’s all they do, all we do, culture is one long seduction and there’s no religion like the present. “Never put off to tomorrow what you could put off to the day after tomorrow,” never trust a living man to tell you what a dead man thought. Or vice versa. Though Freud knew a thing or two: Anatomy is Destiny he said, and that’s not very comfortable is it, especially when the mirror throws opens its arms and says “It’s you!”

POISSON D’AVRIL

Sing song. I am the soloists in the Matthew Passion. I sing all the roles, and do it all at once.
A groan, a sigh, a high note held and all is silence once again as it was before I was invented.

By you, you cunning wombical machine that plucks us out of nescience and nonentity (but is there a difference?) and lands us safe in our paratrooper boots licking Macy’s windows in the snow.

I speak from experience, hence have nothing you can use. All I was I am in you, and no more to be than such requires. A sword falls from its scabbard, its rattle rouses the comatose audience, likened by Proust famously to a coral reef alive sort of but very still. It’s me waving my arms at you, me at the keyboard, happy birthday Rachmaninoff, it’s April Fool’s Day and the fish fly high, higher than the coachman’s celebrated D over high C, see, it’s visual, really, staves and quavers, darts and quivers, it’s all music and the words are my choristers in their chaste albs apart up there in the choir with their smutty thoughts.

Things catching up with themselves teach us a thing or two—time is the first democrat—or tries to be—night falls on everyone but some have fire.

Some have not much. Simple things explain complexities. A child drinks milk—half his body hides below the table, only the face and hands appear, those masks of consciousness, and Freud is proven.

We don’t need much beyond our need.

Ten a.m. the quiet dining room sun coming in on the vivid old poinsettia and the pale new lilies, winter ending, Charlotte’s voice upstairs, I am so happy.

Accumulate the obvious until.
What. The star shatters (masculine in German, like the moon) or shimmers (a Schimmel is a fine white horse) or Sherry we haven’t seen her in over a month through there is an old white horse all winter in a neighbor’s field seemingly content to stand there calmly the way things do (is a horse a thing?) (are you?) and we pass by him every day, the moon on four legs in fog nibbling whatever. (How can a star break?) Did the astronauts who ambled on the moon (did they?) have anything to say about her gender (his?)? How can you travel so far and not know a boy from a girl (what is science?) and what kind of people are we to send (to be) such innocents out on our investigations? Does a mouse (is there?) know more about my house than I do?
The obvious answer cries out for refutation—you can’t tavel a mile without encountering (a white horse?) (a philosopher?).

Who are the most articulate people you know and why? Some with their bodies some with their mouths some with the way they look at you in silence across the room what is the DNA for Extended Presence for being a little bit larger than life? Some people stick out beyond the edges of themselves like the demon who holds the world in his claws outside the world. When you meet these people you know that time and death are overrated.

Presence is the other side of being, when you meet one of these you feel its breath.
Speed up, slow down and let the squirrel cross in peace this is still America the road has rights or maybe only the road has rights.

Sunshine—you can feel the grass thinking its way up from the dark.
Logic is scattered over our fields like the bones of animals we rode to death all winter.

What a road does: a road wakes.

ESSENCE LASTS AS LONG AS ANIMAL

On the day 1-Reed one rests.
This day is one house and you live in the sound of words.
You are a nice little girl, the grandparents I never had a white stallion snorting in the cold.
Why did I come into this story, I make it stupid when I come, I’m just a green hose in your garden, aught but orifice. A reed.
One reed. A raft of reeds.
A house made of bundled reeds plastered over with marsh mud.
A Grecian column imitating reeds, reeds that hold up the sky.
Authority. You and I, townspeople to each other, handy at tying thing to thing, fierce as young girls smiling, teeth of the pinewoods, locusts singing their opera every seventeen years on the move.
All our wars, our waiting rooms, my funeral where you wept, churches full of eyes that size you up.
They want to kill, or kiss, or both or go to sleep with eyelids trembling over the hopeless REM work of their dream.
They have written their names all over our skin, have licked our wallets, aesthetic, sucked. Worry not neither fret—they will do to you no more than I have all these years since Serpo first slipped Eden.
We are devils to each other, and we dream.

Easter. Passover. Broken crumbs and weeping children. The veils fall down. Long hours hearing what no one believes. If we did we would not need to say it in words.
I lie down. It is simple enough in principle, a cushion. Now I rest my head where Isis sat, she left behind a chair to be her sign, whenever we sit down it is a prayer, an old prayer, real as our bodies, mindless, beautifully animal.
No other creature sits upon a chair it builds to sit on. Our godly bodies drag us towards the truth, a child, climb your hair to heaven.

Let everything.
You have no choice but permission.
Let it river its milk in you let it be the color of what it wants a hymn to the sun a hymn to the other side of space where no one lives let it wait or go just let it claim us for its own the hard habit of being it takes care of itself and we have no self to take care of, let it not even be it is not your problem your problem is me.

Jung’s Liber Novus, the ‘Red Book’ lies by the window in rainlight next to an album about Scottish fairies. They are the same book—every story is the same story, every one tells there is another pace not here and not now and you can let it come into you and make you part of it.

And how could we even know what here and now really are, is, if we didn’t have somehow that radiant elsewhere to reveal?

HEAVENBANDS

Things. Or vanish me.
A ruin by a river something old was never new I held its hand as it remembered sunshine or rain the apt façade along the god house picturing the hellish sports of heaven girl after girl. Konarak.
We do it in the air. Planes fall down and curves are permanent, traces left in consciousness we rise to adore.
