THE BUILDERS

for Steven and Sara

Stray intimates

in long deciding how will walk who

in which remember—

o the architect

that wildflower is all the welcomer

who bids me in?

Did you scale shadows to shame my meagerness, make darkness my messenger, your balconies make angels of us, when?

To enclose space

is it rape or rapture,

a beautiful hand

grasping emptiness

ciaresses us

we are enclosed

luminiferous interior

safe as daylight

summons us to stay—

to inhabit beauty!

Buildings marry us invade our space with their own—and we call such spaces ‘buildings’ because the main thing about them is that someone’s there someone, you, built this whatever it is, a shape of spaces in the hope of home, the building of it comes first that is what counts the artifex has had his say his do-like-this, his open-this-door-only and be most strange at home in this space where you have never been.

This hard language speaks to your skin
width weight
and you answer
with your limbs, even your breath is shaped by this air you enter,
well-wrought freshness of a made place

the whole world outside is a beautiful accident.

Have to get closer than that.
Less lyric, more absolute.
Geometry needs no rough edges—leave them to CERN, physics and other poetries—a building can’t stop answering that question you’re afraid to ask.

3.
Over the lintel at Delphi the letter E epsilon, which in Attic Greek meant

‘you are.’

Remember you exist, remember it’s no god no principle no authority—just you.

Architecture, like oracles, remind us to be.

Every step you take relates to this deliberate structure—existence is the only absolute, our contingency a weird kind of certitude.

If you can walk through the door you are a human on earth and the whole earth belongs to you as much as anyone—democracy is a door.

A cathedral is a gift to the people not to God.
The best religion is a vacant house.

Architect—one who makes arches.

Hummingbird—one who makes flowers.

Is a building a shimmer in the mind first, a mirage for Aladdin, smoke dream, a building is the shadow of desire—and when Holl lays the skyscraper horizontal on the Chinese earth he heals more than the sky—he heals us of the fierce ascent we have been cursed with since the ziggurat, now from room to room we glide, rolling easy, drawn by eyes alone—the soft horizon bids us always in he built the distances indoors the high far hallows the end of the hall rooms are the letters of an alphabet—each building is its own language wrap the room around me and goodnight.

All times a mash of who permanent identities in shriveling bodies the ones I knew are with the Guermantes now faces barely match what felt in me still fresh—flower in Lucite?—after?
After what? I thought I was remembering a person but I was remembering a moment she belonged to, and I did too, now neither of us can do more than gaze stupidly into this puzzling memento, a trinket of Venetian glass, a seashell from Point Lobos.

No one must touch me no one must know the alphabet is full of lies but only we can tell left to themselves the letters are pure as the sky or the birds that flock across it wild geese over the river.

No drought the day—

memories are best when you don’t remember them, leave them as input, impulse, inertial thrust to a meeting with the apparent new, the seemingly unremembered. But you’ll never know.

You never know.

Sit outside and wait for me.

Aubergine evening.

Dormice chittering

under the eaves

the sky full of listening.

People live there while they can—strange that I don’t know whether people I’m thinking about are still there or have died—don’t know by outer information surely, but strange that the imagining inside can’t tell (like Rilke’s angels) whether it’s dealing with the living or the dead.

Rage in range

the angry

round us—a child

tore the gift book enraged not at it but angry at the love

means giving

he deemed inadequate terribly fierce is the judgment of a child

my hand trembles

to remember it

the loving inscription torn out—a tantrum he will live with all his life

the angular explosion out of the too nourished body revenge, revenge for what—

8.viii.12
The meek control the earth with their lassitude—lulled by the spectacle of such ignoring the alpha males are tricked into their endless supremacies, become kings, commissars, executives, bankers, generalissimos, popes.
They strut and war and tax and punish they display and conquer and are vanquished they merge and all the while the meek smile their little lazy smiles and sleep sound in hovels, barracks, jails.
The meek have inherited the earth and have given their heritage away.
History is the consent of the government.
No other story but techniques of being ruined.

Something tired in the tepid air a mournful hush— aucun oiseau—the fox is still asleep—those deer and their fawn are nestled back there so many resting places on this earth.

They tell me rest. You have been a ferryboat too long, groaning your way through the oily harbor from ocean feeling to the coast of word and back again to dream.

For the sea is nothing but my sleep and you are sometimes open there—but on such a morning as this all the seas are trees and rise to whelm with green waves your enstatic calm—say something, anything, to break the spell

I cast on you but can’t undo—only you can speak the silver word.

Can’t get there and isn’t anyhow a where or how just this like breathing has no natural end—death is a bad idea men bought into like war and money—
learned it from animals—
pets teach death—
and now it’s hardly here before it’s gone.
Go on with this instead, a rap

on no one’s door.

That they run

that agency that runs the lake runs the mountain too—

—how can we understand such weather — give me a cloud and I’ll stop asking — latterly frequently troubling you—all we are is intermissions of a silent rapture—

Odic force and naked lightning and the train lurches by like the whole nineteenth century or swim too close to the waterfall and you belong.

Iguaçu for instance or the electronics mall in Paraguay.

Sovereign Pontiff

puzzled by all the bridges that God made and left him he thinks in charge of—

we are a race of smugglers, girls smoke and boys get tattoos the gospel withers.

Sweat the least of things because the inland sailors come smiling like gibbons in the barren trees—3.

but I saw this sacred couple stand unsmiling in the bamboo grove—the crow tells me far more than I can understand, I write down the fraction and pray for the whole they stared out at me as if I were a camera the trees grow taller every day they are giants now, they surround my house they hide the road, I hear cars they don’t let me see every day closer, just great green leafy trees and far away sky—where the crows are. That they understand.

The important people in my life are sleeping now. The arrow points to some o’clock that has no easy number—church steeple, pigeon coop, beer saloon were old names for that hour or hot air from the subway grating forced up out of the secret tubes the underseen. Time to go home it keeps telling but the woman still is in her clothes the moon is captured by the trees and nothing works the way you suppose but everything works.

That’s the sad of it, elderberry juice in the Prater, old man crying in the rain the Emperor will never come home he never left

he’s hiding in the attic now fighting Chickamauga all over again a little silver plate gleaming in his skull.
