12-2012
decA2012

Robert Kelly
Bard College

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.bard.edu/rk_manuscripts

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcommons.bard.edu/rk_manuscripts/279

This Manuscript is brought to you for free and open access by the Robert Kelly Archive at Bard Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Robert Kelly Manuscripts by an authorized administrator of Bard Digital Commons. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@bard.edu.
My Basque my understanding it came through you
you cut your corridor Santander
through which it all came to be us, the afterlings, Kelts and such,
to be me and like me,
to be west
the end of Europe and you are the firstlings there, still there,

Europe Island
allow me to presume
I am all the islands, gladly naked and groan all Greek and Gaeling—you
sucked me through you to become myself (forgive my exactness)
how did you do it and do you do it still,
all ram’s horns and mountains cheese and dialects,
do it
by speaking no known language—Berlioz thought the demons spoke like you—my Basque, my inbetweener where the continent’s waist is slimmest where a tin merchant or a vendor of wine jars can walk in reasonable weeks from the neighborhood sea to the unbounded ocean and there find the princely islands of the unimagined green in the sea mist and a gannet giggling.

So that to see any mountain even now, even Erigal over the bridge of tears, to see any mountain is to know I come from there.

The thing is we move west.

It all does,
it always will, until we, I mean me, have come round again and conquered all those who — missing the moment the music—stayed home.

   And Sant Iago showed us the way turned his back on Jerusalem and came to the sea.

2.
But can’t tell we from me.
That’s the sleaze of me,
snow slick on my roads,
mass of a car hurtling—what is the number
the page the cellphone the bird overhead deer escaping through saplings how can I
be a part of this, endure the separation of myself from all that I witness, from the previous condition
I keep trying to imagine, remember, those verbs are the same, aren’t they, reverberate in the hollow chest—now where did I leave my heart the Giant said
and the young Hero heard.
I stole the Giant’s heart I hid it in my stinking little self—that’s why I lift you up, remember myself in time and let you fall undevoured.

When I was a boy I heard an old man say
my heart is bad
and thought I knew what it meant,
I thought I had one too.

1 December 2012
Non omnis moriar
or will be born again
as an active verb
in someone else’s body who will be or will not be me—because the me I suppose
will falter living
into the world
as a word or a book or a memory and the real one—unknown to me—will endure again the ecstasy of life
on this or some such earth.

This is a mix of what I know and what I have been told—and if I believe them and me, what shall I do for supper? Quiet mind, done travelling, keeping watch. All the rest is language. The beauty.

1 December 2012
Once all the cars were black and all the pages blank now I have filled them all and colors shoot up and down the street.

1.XII.12
Wail this waiting
but serve.
U and I
are side by side
on the keyboard,
the hands make
many mistakes,
maybe one day
they’ll get it right and we’ll be all that’s left.

2 December 2012
We see branches as reaching for the sky we see the trees surrendering to a higher power.
But when we lift our arms nothing happens.
Nothing accepts.
   The trees we are
stand leafless and cold.

2 December 2012
Notice these things
a lip like your mother
an eye like your own
the dangers of folklore are all round you now captivating shimmer of light in the wolf’s deep fur, she-dragon in her gorge.
Walk the other way, knight, get lost before you get found.

2 December 2012
ELEVEN-IMÖX

Today is Eleven
    Lizard
    Crazy
pray for rain
    the sky
opens.
    Mayan Calendar
    the Daykeepers
have kept all these years.
These years.

And people think the world can end!

Let your right hand
hold your left hand
steady, don’t wobble,
the end of the world
comes every single day.

Don’t think about it.
Or don’t think
the one you are today
was here yesterday.
Not at all—

You are new,
new. Here for the first time, no wonder we’re so anxious
all the time,

we’re all impostors
pretending to fill our own names like a little boy trying to wear his father’s coat.

The Mayans knew,
every cycle ends
a new cycle begins,
forget prophecies,

o those dreamy optimists
who wish that anything could ever end, let alone a world!

O the aching poor
who can think of no other way their misery can end.

But nothing ends.
Time is crazy, tumultuous, unrelenting,
a crazy dancer, never stops,

Maybe that’s why
we invented art—
to give edges to experience, so things have limits,
limits,
start and finish.
Because nothing else ever ends except this.

2 December 2012
(for my Charlotte birthday reading tonight)
(DANCE BUILDING)

The other evening after a reading, Steven Holl talked to me about poems, lines of poems, about dance. I thought right away of dance as the dominant metaphor in early 20th Century poetry: Yeats, Eliot, Pound, Williams and many more—swayed by the graces of Loie Fuller and Nijinsky and Isadora Duncan. And here was a marvel for me, an architect letting the cat out of the bag, speaking of the dance; who could know the dance better than someone who makes buildings open up and stand?

A building, like a dance, is something to do.

You do it on foot, by steps, or stepping over.
There is light in its air, it wields light and dark to some purpose, shows and conceals. It doors. It windows.

The light or dark body in its dark or light clothes moves through the dark of hallways and the glare of skylights. I see them walking in an air of glory an old poem said. A building makes, can make, even the most thoughtless workers or visitors part of a corps de ballet, the hushed music of people passing through shaped spaces.

Shaped space.

The constant dance. Can you open a door without dance moves, trot down a hallway, turn at the newel post and rush downstairs? And the beautiful solo of someone crossing an empty atrium at twilight, the interior lighting beginning to conquer the filtered light of the unshaped world outside.

Space has its arms around us, space is the eternal partner of the dancer, of the building.

The dancer and the building: both explore, explain, _les espaces du dedans_, the interior realms from which poetry comes palavering—you can hear the resonance of shaped space inside the tone of the poem, just as you can hear the dancer’s body in the rhythm of the poet’s breath.

Time is an illusion that comes from moving in space. Space is the only reality, we are the same as the sky.

And so the Tibetans call their dakinis _sky-dancers_ or _sky-walkers_, those seldom seen dancers who occupy the space outside us and the space inside us too, us, we noble sinners of flesh and mind.

We open the door, and everything goes in with us.

The building makes us move.

And now there are buildings whose doors open by themselves as we come near, the building yearns for us and we yearn to be drawn in.

When we look at some of the beautiful buildings from the past (I think of Wells Cathedral with its amazing dance of stairs, or Ely on its hill), we see that they are not made just as single visual gestures, a simple sign in the sky or sculpture to admire. These great buildings shape the space of the towns they stand in or watch over, just as they shape the movements, I’ll insist on calling them dance, of everyone who comes inside. Shaped space shapes us. They are the dancers of the city.

I get tired thinking about buildings with no people in them, poems without readers. Where is the insistent dance of inside and outside, then?

The dance inside a Catholic church or public library or elementary school, my body remembers every building it has been forced to dance through, been danced to by. Why don’t we see architects as they primal artists, whose shaping of our terrain makes it possible for everything else to happen, for us to learn to shape things for ourselves? If they can shape a cave or a whole hill, we can shape a set of words, some colors on the rock, some sounds in a tune. Even the caves of the Dordogne where ‘art’ first shows itself are shaped spaces, shaped by image and light and dark if not by trowel and pickaxe. And then thousands of years later and thousands of years ago, we see the simultaneity of architecture, painting and sculpture in Anatolia: Çatal Hüyük, Göbekli Tepe.

And isn’t the darkest cruelty of a prison that it decrees: in this place you will not dance? Piranesi tried to lighten the weight of that—and the secret of his great pictures was that he enlarged the space confined, made it vast, no less menacing and dreadful, but at least the body forced to linger there had room to move.

This morning deep mist poured through the trees in the hour after dawn, dense as sea fog. The mist reminded me that the world around us is not just about seeing; it veils itself so we have to move to know it, move through what we think we’ve seen and find something only the moving body knows. Those old architects who laid out a labyrinth on the floor of a cathedral’s nave or narthex, that ‘going to Jerusalem’, turned a casual churchgoer into a brave pilgrim, moving in sacred space.

Knowing something means moving with it. A solitary dancer dances with her own shadow—who else is there? In public we move with others, the brilliant massed dance of pedestrians we see crossing 42nd Street and 5th Avenue every time the light turns green, hundreds of them moving through and with each other, never touching—the city makes them do it.

Any building can teach us. Let us maybe come to judge a building by the dance it makes us do. The art of space, space known and embraced, space used, married, flirted with, surrendered to.

People think dance studios have mirrored walls so the dancers can see themselves. Not so. The glass is there to multiply space, so the dancers can see the space in which they feel themselves moving. That they know by moving.

3 December 2012
Mist and owl
I know you’re there
the mist is clearing owl sleeping
in dark clothing
on their way to school.

3 December 2012
Symbiotes of starlight
the matter in your hands members of the body
as we are also of.

3.XII.12