When you’re lonely call the animal the animal will always answer but what pale eyes it has!
how far it travels in a single afternoon!

If you could go with it surely even you could outrun loneliness, but as it is it comes to you and touches and consoles.
But how pale its eyes are even so.

THE CUP

That could be my cup
this friendly woman at the ice cream truck or that priest across the street all beard and Mare Nostrum manners or the two Israelis playing chess out loud or the kid apparently asleep on the grass.
But I have no cup, no cup for me,
I have to shove my face up and drink from the sky.

Because there are things to love and no not turn their backs on you and even if they one day did their backs have nothing written on them no love letter no agreement no farewell because the skin is the silentest of all.

Because I am only what I am you can listen as hard as you can and I still don’t mean anything at all.

Lift

into the chamber

good knows itself

this other

knowing—

short breath short steps endless journey.

Hold my hand

against your wall

let me feel

what feels you.

Cloth of houses.

Skin of light.

The snow said beautiful
the rice becoming of a branchlet, oak,

I am a car for you, I think,
a dark marauder in the overexplained day—

we are sinews of each other.
Man speaks to God,
looks around for answers.

Be otherwise, darling,
proliferate inside most spacious emptiness, build in, build in—this hollow body your best house.

Steal a glimpse
through the curtain
see something I’m sure we’re allowed to see—
wild animals
quietly stirring,
waiting their apocalypse—
a word that means revealing, not catastrophe.
Close the curtain carefully. There.
Keep the words straight
and we’ll be all right.
Now wait and see.

Can this catch the weather? Rarely.
What is this? The wanderer is still with us, passes below us through the caverns of our inattention.
We call them streets but they are long terribly empty bedrooms.
At one end the window is completely by the eye and beak of an immense crow.

Take it or leave it.
When I woke up the trees were delicately traced with snow each branch and twig.
Now they’re bare as ever and the snow is all on the ground.
There’s a darkness in things that waits its turn. A light later only you can turn on.
The job is yours if you want it.
Love me as hard as the ground.

Not yet light
a growling in the sky
like a snowplow way up the road but it isn’t snowing
or a cargo jet up there but we’re not on the route to anywhere o where could it come from,
no light yet, or just enough to make out the dense cloudbank,
a growling in the sky.
I feel spoken to by it,
why not, I’m the only one here.

Dawn nocturne the turn against time, serene morning, the words once betrayed sulk far from what you mean to mean although you’re writing almost fast enough to be.

Interrupt to grant myself a late appointment an artist to be seen, a picture that needs talking to. Will I remember this after sunrise, when the phones fly again and machinery pretends to run?
Right now it’s just me and one or two passing cars, those animals.
How far away it is I am!

Hoof clatter
only in my head—
January katydids
tinnitus.

18.1.13
in memoriam H.B.

Writing in the dark inspects the night—
and what the light never happened—

is that a thought too?
‘Language can say
what you can’t think’

dear Heinrich, how much your little gave.

18 January 2013
It’s worth thanking everyone—it’s so beautifully made like the inner surface of the sky where her legs and belly come together and the light pours out.

18 January 2013
Write your way to it
then burrow inside
till the words sleep in your mouth.
And maybe you wake up.

18 January 2013
If not a rapture
then something like,
winter sky
through winter trees,
the silence given
all the way to us.

18 January 2013
A book longer than a week
a song longer than a tree but what about an owl?
Or the blue sky beyond the windmill?

VOCATION

There are depths and margins and a blue coin fallen from a woman’s hand pick it up and give it back to her hurry after her, give it back even if it takes your whole life.

VOX NIVIS

and me listening.
Beethoven’s Large Fugue
Youtube. Enjoying
the kindness of strangers.

19 January 2013
It began as a good idea.
A lifetime later
it has become a vast steel bridge over a dark river
leading to an island
where no one lives
where no one wants to go.

19 January 2013
I was a tree once
and so were you
since then our relations have been formal
maybe excessively so.
Can we do anything
about it or is is too late, will our natural fear of fire keep us safely far apart?

19 January 2013
Capture the shadow of a seagull, breed the shadows of tropical fish in a paper aquarium.

Write a book.
