Darkness moonlight silence sounds of far-off traffic raccoon cough in underbrush.
Eat these. They feed your dream.

26 June 2009
Not to admit infirmity or permit the reasoning of incapacity to argue present pleasure—walk on the grass until it kills you stay up late smoking the opium of moonlight.

27 June 2009
People who sweat forget
they were ever cold.
Since the caves
we have been told remember
by great teachers, all the ones whose names I can’t recall.

27 June 2009
Nothing rhymes with what I really mean—there is a billboard on the moon whose advertising changes so slowly that one generation hardly understands what the next one thinks they read up there by way of instruction.

Year by year religions come and go, they keep their names but change the inner nature of the god[s] they worship. Thus the Jews began by worshiping a few local deities, settled on one warrior god of hosts whose name they still reverently apply to an almost abstract deity of high compassion and intelligence they almost worship now. And a Christian goes through life performing the same rituals, mouthing the same glorious or tawdry liturgies, but all the while his inner sense of what the words mean or what he means by saying them changes as the moon instructs him. when he studies it at night or just by valid or mistaken inference from its light reflected on other people’s faces.

Just so a man mostly looks at his lover’s face to see what the moon is selling us these days.

But spoken with respect. O moon my cramer also in the sky, TV far and present concubine, minstrel mine and all-forgiving — from no one do you hold back your shine. o my coolest comfort and la-di-da, my all-night doctor palaver and queen of space!
Listen careful how she does by me: she lets me love each thing I see and guess the rest. So much for me.

My own appalling minstrelsly though don’t blame on her.
Or me either, as we say, it is the ether, the between-space shimmering with misunderstanding, the tuneful opportunities that leave us old. lute and Lied and aria and rap when arioso dolente is what we need, a singing silence stung by grief

A train is going by at any other hour of the day would be far-away but here in the valley of midnight a quarter-mile of air brushes my shoulder.

27.VI.09
DE ISIDE TRIPLICI

O Isis, Nephthys and Osiris, three in one, approach us!
That’s what I cried out as the luminous figure glided towards us, then towards a mirror slightly to our right. Earlier, she had been a smaller figure I watched dancing – something I had never seen. I cried out to Charlotte to come watch the dance. It was a person dancing – at first awkward, then slowly smoother and swifter – on the bones of her pelvis and legs alone. No flesh, no skin, and the bones all fused together, like great white horns or calipers, stiff, but the dance augmented. You and/or they come to watch when I called, and we all watched as the dancer grew taller and taller. Now a head appeared above the keystone-shaped, blunt torso, and the head had no face or features, yet was full of personhood. And as she grew, arms happened too, and she raised them to her chest and opened her body, spreading it wide so we could see inside much whiteness and a vague sense of structure, like shelves. At the back of that cavity, a sheet of common metal, from which or around which her light poured out at us. She approached us speaking, growing taller as she moved, all bone and light and magnitude—powerful sense of her greatness, the greatness of this being.
She veered slightly so as to stand in front of a tall mirror to our right. She paused there, as if considering the nature of her own light, as God might have looked on the seventh day, contemplating what had been made. And I cried out what I said, O Isis, Nephthis, and Osiris, because I recognized her as Isis and the rest, all one, all trinity in that unity.

I was tremendously excited by the dream, and woke closer to actual waking, where I continued dreaming, dreaming now that I was awake, and in that shallower dream I “analyzed” my dream in terms of language, as if Isis had taught me (again!) that language is structure—not the coy vacancies of the bright and beautiful body, the hollow body of light, but only language, and language gives us the only structure there is.

dreamt at dawn, 28 June 2009
A pencil balancing the moon—easier at full, tricky now in the Byzantine last days of her crescent—a smutty inference always available at the eastern end of Mare Nostrum,

I have seen it from the sky like Egypt and the Nile’s mouths or the Iron Gates on Danube or a cloud that looks like wine—everything wants to be in the Bible.

HUMANISM

Street lights in hell
red lights in heaven waiting for GO

prohibition palm trees—approach the merest

some things are made small so we have to approach them on our knees

Reverence is the only open mind.

28 June 2009
When I finally became somebody else it was better for a while but I kept creeping back in until the swimming pool was empty duck decoys scattered off the shelf and sank and my beard turned white where was I waiting all the while somebody else was right?

28 June 2009
The rising sun
is the punch line
in a joke somebody told in dream
we all forgot.

28 June 2009
Sheetmusic
He slept like a miracle and woke like a dog – always something new to chase like a flag trying to outrun the wind

28 June 2009
Sheetmusic
Where do things go?
Am I someone else today?

Sweet breezes
a footprint left in the mind.

28.VI.09
Secular humanism is the same as magic.
It thinks human attitude affects the operation of the world—that’s why the churches hate humanism: humanism wields miracles the lepers are cleansed, the grieving are consoled, the poor are fed.

What Jesus said
somebody finally listened to.

28 June 2009
I thought I was drowning then I was dreaming.
Now I wonder what the difference is when we have to do everything over again.

28.VI.09
To be here before the sun just gets over the trees and be ready for the light armed with my own darknesses arrayed to give some deeper meaning to the day—

show fight they used to say of such fish as I must be trawled by that potentate aloft.

You have to fight the natural because it’s easy, resist the easy because it is easy, make a nuisance of yourself, a gall on the oak tree from which Voltaire will fetch his bitter ink or Blake his luminous contradictions.
You have a right to be wrong.

29 June 2009
Familiar smell from unfamiliar place comes—what then? This is how you begin to learn history, tribes of men ever on the go, prowl of beauty round the edges of fact.

Surprise yourself and forget the one you were—another love is on the way this afternoon, be there when the door gets pounded on or the bell rings or a sly shadow topples across the book you long ago stopped trying to read.

History has caught you now, genderless, tender, every fact seems to tremble on your skin because you have been here from the beginning.

There is nowhere to go. Kings and their concubines crowd round you, trying to cheer you on.

29 June 2009
Wait a bit upon the opening of her smile—
I know where I need to be now but I don’t know why, the semi-ventral surface of your right thigh as my outback landscape drenched in moonlight any time of day or night—the ground itself is luminous and all the Christians flee leaving Christ alone with me and your nakedness as if you are Australia my southern continent and I can say all I ever want to you and you will be museum of my silences knowing all the words I meant to say but lost in the angry distances or even the tumbled welcome of the surf around your shore.

29 June 2009
Will my flower ever open she asked and then the volcano began to speak.

29.VI.09
Prickled by pine cone
earth responds
Soil soul. To grow its task. To stop ours. Sharing the quietest war.

29.VI.09.
I felt it falling
the first like a gnat grazing my scalp
then another and another and it was raining.
It felt like the first time.
I stood up and went inside, this is shelter, I thought, and felt I had been through something
and come through safe.
Feeling and thinking.
Cool wetness on my brow thinking nothing.

Stop treating myself like an invalid as I’ve been doing for a week.

Si tu vales, ego quoque valeo—that’s where healing starts: in seeking the welfare of the other—if you are hale, then I’m hale too, hale and well and hope to be of use.

30 June 2009
My notebook these days sounds too much like a diary.
It’s supposed to be a dairy milk and butter for my betters till you’re all well-nourished on my cheese, then I’ll be well and come out buy your bread.

30 June 2009
Eventually have to forget otherwise pain and no need more of that – we walked all through that small Italian night talking it out fingering each pain: remember me it seemed to say what we did to each other was small refusals only inside an immense yes.
It was like a tree at dawn you put in front of you to shield your precious eyes from the determined light.

ARS POETICA

Trim it down to wood.
Say everything
then cut away the truth—what’s left is the truth.

30 June 2009
Glossy grackle. Crow.
A turkey clucking.
Trees on guard.
At last I realize that morning is a verb.

30 June 2009
I have tried to fit my fingers in them in all the losses, all the arroyos now where rivers were, and went, and left, and then my forearms, finally my face found a choice socketing nestled furrow where the earth I smelled was altogether new and that’s what I most desired especially of any animal I could call you could call me back by any name you chose, me lying on my face in contact deep with everything that has ever been as it was now new, new now.
Not known now known.
I wanted you to bring me to life again—what is this business with getting born why should it happen only once—do it again to me do it again it’s not too much to ask it all to be my mother, every time you touch me is my mother and every word you utter gives me birth.
