Mountain calm and ocean other—
sparrows they call greedy
but I would spare all birds.
I want a vegan mind.

Boston, 30.V.09
A century ago I had this shore.
Same steeples same shadows
of the same trees.  Same me.
I come again and again
to the same shore.  Time changes only itself, doesn’t change me.
I am from a somehow planet before.

Sometimes confusion sets in.
It is a pilot sans avion
a fang without a serpent
to wield it, a commonplace mistake. I love lists.
I often mistake them for poetry.

All over the world at this hour thousands and thousands of old men just want to go to sleep.

late June 2009
Sleep now—for sleep
is a sledge carries
fast over blood-stained snow.

Sleep is travel,
didn’t you know?

Sleep in getting somewhere,
somewhere I need to be.

That is why we say we go to sleep.

Blue chrysanthemums
maybe I believe
or maybe a bold pirate
come walking on the sea
to bite my boat.
No wonder a dry dream.

A meadow so big
it hurts to look at it—

pudor kicks in, modesty, one is abashed at seeing

all by my self’s own eyes
something so wide

a green immensity someone owns.

Siste, viator, domi.
—RK, 1951

Capturing the fullness of the mauve petunias beneath the locust tree—all the names are wrong—cars are born antiques, they all belong to a long-ago understanding of coming and going and being somewhere, a past still with us, Only sitting on a bench is permanent, watching traffic flow. Stay home, traveler. And what could be better Latin than all your years, and all your senses mastering the unconscious procession, dreamers mooching by, dreamers hurrying everywhere—that color, there.

Examining the fourness of a fourleaf clover given me by Rinpoche, examining the word ‘give’ and ‘given’. Examining what it means to examine. It has four leaves. Not one is me. Neither am I. The word dissolves in the mouth and I know everything after all.

As if examine
long apart
a whim needed

Salton Sea a maze
with a highway at its core
among all the curves
one stretch of stranger.

And who will I be then?
That’s what a lover asks,
delicately breathing on
the gateway to the maze.

Each tree
is a presence,
a meaning,
a sentence.
A statement.
Perhaps a person.

THE JUDGE

When they’re too young to be old
and too old to be,
they come to me. I am Minos,
I have done every kind of wrong
so they made me a judge.
I made my wife sleep with an animal
so her child would not be my child,
he would be no man’s son, a monster
— speaking socially. So he would kill all those I yearn for and could not touch.
Not for lack of power, or bad laws—
I am the law. No, I couldn’t touch them because something in me will not reach out, something proud and cold in its bone house.
Let him do it, my little Bullcalf. It will be enough for me eternally to judge the dead who stand before me surprised by their whole lives.

The things our faces tell us
when we see them on other people—

what does the meaning mean
we think they say?

Quiet mind. Smooth pale bark of the ancient beech tree

here, before and after.
