BATTLES

Antietam her brother fell her angel in cement stands over blood drips from the name itself

Belleau Wood what shall we do the trees are demons bomb the trees the brain artillery scullery trash

Chickamauga father blood father blood a sword with a nicked blade steel nick in the skull of Uncle Ad

Delhi drought-shallow Yamuna red stink riverbottom besiege me blook love's bowstrings made of bees

El Alamein a politics of little knives the rain will never come the sand speaks every language you can die

(Please be me by battle be me by war I fear the Turks are coming the Saracens are at the door the Vikings storm up every wick the Redcoats will eat our maize and spoil my only daughter Kate I love her high notes in Greenland's Icy Mountains the cellar is filled up with rain a blacksnake shivers on a morning rock and still the soldiers are coming but do not come)

Where could the father be who left his son to wallow in the mud of Gettysburg

Let the psaltery resay it never enough praise the hills have to hop trees cry you you are my weather and my accident all the rest is essence praise

But is your name the essence too?
How can so many bear to be called You?

Lingering channels of fog after rain
I follow them through trees

fog always knows something worth knowing something it hides—

Go to what is most deeply hidden, where else could I find it before the sun climbs high and hides everything in light?

Excitements of Brumaire.

Any fog any mist. Why.

Because it lures the eye and makes me look because it's hard to see. Because it reminds my genetic code of some other island?

Because it silently touches everything?

Your hair damp come in from the woods.

Apologize to the crows for wasting their eternity fighting our wars.

(Sleepless, composing political haikus)

AMERICANS

One percent of all of us are in jail—what a shitty haiku, this.

Most of us in prison are male and black.
Guess what color judges are.

The things one thinks wake two later.

Everything amounts to blue—the incomprehensible amounts to mystery:

that is, poetry you can't understand opens, through words, a door that words you understand can never open, we make words into the gates of mystery and open them.

Not Blake's Rahab the harlot of priestcraft government obfuscation imposition but a song slender as silverpoint the mysterium: uninterpreted sensation sung by color in the ear the sacred sin of skin.

ANCIENT UNIFORMS

legionary devices leaning on the sky—

imagine blindness, seeing only in your dreams.

Imagine weather rush home from any where you are—to be a fugitive is crucial, running away is our episteme, madmen rushing through rosebushes to become the color of what they see, a thorn in your Asia Minor traced it trickles out as liberty a bad word for being free.

Feel free. The iron tread up the fire escape the water tower of the rising sun I walked towards Fifth Avenue when the world was young.

Too wake to sleep too sleep to write I live inside photos almost come alive.
Daylight almost is.

Sin on salt meadow we have to go walking the rain is on our feet sunset a cloud carapace jumbos grumbling down to Logan when I hear a sound above (thunder on the left, templum of the sky) I know that space has come space arms around me I would sleep and miles from here a north marsh stretches out in wind,

(Dreamt:)

they say when the smells of roast pork or bacon frying fill the air the pigs are silent in the barnyard, the pigs do not squeal.

(Night crawling thought, insomniac:)

Poets by their nature are not sequacious of honors for other poets. The more they respect the words of another poet the less they pronounce his name, lest Fame overhear and crown him with bay leaves instead.

Laurel smells very evil on someone else's head.
