What can you say to the ones who don’t talk?
Say alligator crocodile the difference the little hill in sunlight over the sunflower fields near Cavaillon does that make sense can you hear me I will assume silence means assent you have agreed to the world and I am in it you have taken my hand in marriage now I am yours.

22 April 2007
The napkin folds
over and over
on itself, and when the waiter flicks it open more napkin, nothing
but napkin can a poem be like that a word folded over
nine times on itself
isn’t that the limit,
paper, carpet, a book
on the lap of a woman
fallen asleep reading it,
the cloth of words?

22 April 2007
Blue flowers, a knoll. Facing them.
Being in one’s own place. Only a moment is or could be. One is a one so menaced by elsewhere.
In the heart, that sumptuous Reception, one is a child in a cattle car.
Flower calm, the looking. The flowers see one. Skyblue like over as if one were caught between skies.
The rings on one’s fingers glow at midnight to vouchsafe morning.
Outside and proud of it. Exiled from dream. A flower is an interruption different from silence, or a silence with color in it. One’s space fills with it habits of thinking. Bumble bees all around frost-nipped buds.

22 April 2007
So let me be lord of separations and a dog, a dog is dependency and resentment, I seem to be one of those who reject any love that can’t help loving—so hating dogs is hating god, is hating some narrow kindness in the world, that sunshine of which my skin is so suspicious.

22 April 2007
You don’t need to know
what happens to me,
sight of a long-ship sailing under my lawn
hurrying to be there
in Viking time,

here weather
marries fantasy, their children are cathedrals, stone shadows, broken statues in the desert, signifiers limitless as sand.
Our business is to make the sand.

22 April 2007
Haven’t caught the tune yet to go on. Mystic breakfast, Andaman Islanders learn to dance.

Forty inches deep in my aunt’s living room. This is true, I dreamed it, I showed her on my belly how high the water was.

22 April 2007
The pleasantry, a kind of unloaded arquebus – you see the point of it, you understand the aggression, you smell the smoke but you don’t bleed.
Or no more than stars fall on a summer night.

22 April 2007
Caryatid. I will dream about her thighs holding the sky up. I will dream a quiet temple and fill it up with priestesses tearing certain books into scattered pages snowing the scraps along the nave.
Translucent alabaster. Only the pages so torn to shreds become the books that we call holy.

22 April 2007
Will dream drown in own power, will collaborate with shadow to spell a dingy church and sit in it moping eastward with mere think?

Hope-hobbled, close to the dim ever, still proceeds. As in a piscine blue seldom means sky so in a mirror no one in particular is meant not even you, the long scary antics of mercury only or by this wound know the war is won that’s not begun.

23 April 2007
And on the side of the Night appears that celebrated orator the Mockingbird whose voice we heard just before full dark, arguing plausibly as ever that no one really needs the light, visual event is a mere pleasantry of God, a sweet enough distraction from our proper business, which is learning at last how to hear by touch, and touch by hearing. All the rest is wind and water stuff, and never lasts. But what once holds your skin is permanent. Touch lasts forever.

23 April 2007
Can we meet this forward into now? A letter from the pope again, a seal pup dead along the shore no visible wound. Sometimes things die.

The Dharma is everlasting, my teaching of it will last five thousand years then disappear the Buddha said. And it’s always up to you – who else is there to live you?

People persuading people, trapped in the identity of ownership. And now it’s cold. Now the blue flowers. Now it’s hot. Not.

Now is the most elusive country, a time absent in the core of itself.

Listen, it keeps wanting me to say. But who is speaking? Loosen, loosen language by listening. The sentence has never stopped speaking yet, how can we know what it means?

24 April 2007
Hang the wound on the wall.
And be wall. Listen to all the unlikely arguments. a spurt of cloud almost or air kiss. How close are we to where it has to start?

Don’t worry about the color of the mind, time is ink enough. Eric Gill’s stations of the cross in the cathedral—only a line can talk about desire, about agony. Pain happens to beauty and what then?

Then the stone rolled away—and no one can see the stone again except in dreams, on Thursday nights after pillow chapel, a fat stone a turnip of a rock still rolling downhill from where he launched it, presumptuous mineral that would enclose a man! Do you think you are a woman, boulder? Go on falling or rolling or whatever you mean, cars race along the highway trying to catch up.

24 April 2007
Why is this thing where it is where the Queen can’t find it looking out her little window where the King comes suppliant once a day to ask for breath?

A is for authority. A is for air can’t have one without the other, he kneels and puts his mouth to glass, tries to breathe in. Air is an image—we breathe in what we see.

Blind men breathe only memory.
Or blind men don’t breathe. Language breathes for them. When I was young they sent me to a class for the blind they do things like that, I ran away to where sparks from iron wheels ground on the steel rails above my head that was enough, that was the el, that was street, was visible, was the activity of light scrapping down through the skull and I saw.

24 April 2007
THE SECOND THEOLOGICAL VIRTUE, CALLED HOPE

Nearer to the line marked Fall nearer to thee the chassis travels me still stiff as a pine tree and as far everything is war. What does love say?
Says I. You are the shadow only of such remarks. Nobody can put up with that for long.
Chassis indeed, no matter where it goes.
Till dust bestrew it and evening fall,
the hour between the wolf and the whimbrel, midnight, something stirs. It’s light you fool, itself, it’s wide awake, it’s eight o’clock, forgo your tedious Decadenza, over this grey Hudson cruise ghosts of dead sailors roistering down the drunken avenue.
Do you remember, master, when men wore pants and certain citizens unlike them skirts and folderol?
That was imperial, that was, that was time,
and white was the color of our flag, we yielded pronto and battened on surrender.
Compliance, sweet principle of Yes!
Yes is still an option here, a fireplace in every parlor, a blue bird on every tile, a windmill runs the weather and the mayor’s dead.

25 April 2007
WONDER

But what is the wonder?
Is it the caul round the newborn calf that tells us all prophecy is in the meat?

Is it star? How close we always are to not knowing. That is the beauty part, straight pine sapling, the apple lightly balanced on your palm.

We think about things a long time and then they quietly come.

25 April 2007
Tell me these quiet things do or not do the day allows. There is a silence built in believe it.

Find. For yourself.
The opening is any door
you carry with you
all the time.

Space always reminds.
Even the least distance has a heart, beat,
renewal. Pause.

Things let you
isn’t that enough
the baker the farmer
the brother the wife

that’s it the point is to wife. The rest follows naturally.
The door. The day.

26 April 2007
Too quiet. The verge in matter speaks where the glacier was. Prong.
Through the sediments a pressure cross-purposes with our sense of river.
Sacrifice. Fire is all the wet we have to give you.

27 April 2007
As though there were another chamber hidden in this meek house

where violet magics burn against the mirror and everything to saw in it becomes you ever after a king on her throne an abyss from which small not untuneful voices rise.

27 April 2007, KTC
This is the king’s highway the king never trod this is the elephant’s mounting block no one ever climbed. This is the sky no one ever saw.

It waits, they all wait, inside you now for the blossoming moment to invent itself.
Sometimes you lose the path, sometimes sparrows rise from the dead leaves and tear at your face.

27 April 2007, KTC
The chances of something else pouring out of the glass you poured rum into, remote. But there is always something coming out of the radio like music you can never tell. Spiridon, a name that comes to mind, Christian, Greek, a writer of theology perhaps, a chronicler of lascivious Byzantines. Don’t you wish. Transformation is what this is all about though, you do know that, you do pour something in and something else comes out but you can’t taste it. Only the hearer can, that ardent deity you live to please. Please.

27 April 2007
Cast of a small engagement, actors you’ll never remember, a plot you will never forget. What kind of action is it has no people in it any more? Summer stock. What’s left when nothing’s left. Why does my arm hurt, why does a motorboat remind me of a time before I was born, there is enough breath in the world to say everything. Slow though, like an elephant’s eye, turning to see who pretends to guide it now.

27 April 2007
The trout’s bright opaque eye—he saw something after he died he tries to tell me—

\textit{everything is quick} dead tunes a dial,

    the machinery of soul
never changes,
only the program content somewhat does.

27 April 2007