Without compulsion the delicate remark

a kind surgery to the face I face you with using such pronouns just to set the table for the unknown guests even now hurrying through the rain to eat our food. A miracle that we live.

BREATH OF BREAKING

1.
The president of the sea sails out towards Miracle. a small island in the vast archipelago of ordinary.

Prayer wheels spin on deck —how would we get there at all without the hidden gods, gods hidden in us, not just in ocean?

For I am Cthulhu too, and Poteidan lord of fairyland and folderol.
These, who help me, help me to be more than me, and less.

The rubber grip or ferule on the fountain pens made for the youngest student helps teach ink before the muscles of the wrist forget the alphabet, their share.
Heat on, it’s cold in here.

3.
Back to the ship. The miracles wait for the sad old hulk to heave its breast against the old marble pier—for this land is ancient – in fact it came down to earth before the continents drifted in from old Gondwanaland and some of its wildlife comes from Sagittarius where the whole shebang is heading anyhow—the four-winged parakeet with steel-blue wings the lizard with a thousand golden scales exactly at death each scale becomes a coin and for days the islanders are drunk with spending.

And the fish that sleeps on land safe every night to taste the quiet dark – what a noisy house the ocean has – these animals remind us gently of our origins east of the sun.

We always knew it. Our veins are blue for instance though our blood seems red.
Everything tells us we are strangers here, everything explains. But would you listen?

Not you. It was girls all the time. Or boys.
Or hunting lodges, suicides, ski jumps, symphonies, prizes, suntans, foie gras, didn’t you ever stop to wonder what all these colors are for? Now you skeptics have to board the skipper’s everlasting skiff and be gone to Miracle, the island with two moons and no mouth.

THERE ARE NO MAPS HERE

1. Not to wonder how many wanderers need the other side of broken leaves.

2. Tea hills West Bengal those I knew a little rubble of the Roman steps in Glanum one more city lost into some other a wall you can lean on a stone holds your weight as well as any senator.

3. Quick, be angry, time snatches this mirror, the man with you is dead the woman never speaks to you again.

4. It is always a vineyard of course Rhine or Millbrook Napa Champagne. The train runs through an old war. The names still hurt me. Again and again my uncles died in the clouds of gas until I had seen so many deaths
I felt like the moon but mistressless

5. and a little radio nearby stock exchange chattering numbers Dax and Cac and Footsie squeaked like dormice in roof thatch nothing means much when you’re on a train the names come at me some ancient magician had stolen access to the middle of my head and bellows out the secrets there as if I too were part of the world.

Remember to pretend.
The sun’s gone in now, the root is waiting – plenty of water down there, water is the light below the ground the light you can drink we called it in Atlantis when we were still getting used to this rich planet after the austerity of soul from which we hurried to descend.

And things were left to be me—royal protea, hibiscus everywhere, even here in autumn Rose of Sharon and on Ann’s lawn some amanita as if her comely shrubbery hid a shamaness disguised in Spring Street clothes, dream on, traveler, a house however pale is not the moon, we are not what grows around our dooryard, the savage world we try to tame by word.

Write this down too:
spin a flower trail fingers in the river from the slim flank of the canoe then you too can be my mother a strange sodality you joined one night and forgot to resign from the flowers they send you every year and sometimes leave a pink bill hung on your doorknob, your door, are you finally beginning to understand?

A wheel and what it does before this it was sleeping but where it goes it lets me with it verblessly arrive or spin until we read what the rim says when we move exactly as fast as the world —there’s a word printed on everything all we need is the right speed or sloth to read.

PARTHENOGENESIS

(on a prompt from Lucas V-F)

Part of me knows Genesis and part of me resists any decent flow of tribal history.

Either I had no mother (but I did, I had a loving mother, all her life)
or I was never born.

Another thing is to be born a virgin.

The part of me that knows Genesis doesn’t like the God who howls over the garden, monsoon wind, shaking apples off our only tree.
O apple be a mother to me.

3.
This is how a man is born: a woman picks an apple up and cuts it open, every woman has an ivory-handled knife.

She looks down at the two halves and says a word that only women know, every woman has an ivory-handled word and when it’s spoken the apple grows up tall and thick and pale into the semblance of a man: whose eyes are closed, he’s asleep on his feet.

And then she touches his lips with her ivory fingertips and opens up his eyes.
And this is how it really is but where in your Genesis do you find this?

Faces look up at me from the grain of wood.

Their eyes come sharp as mine unfocus.

People talking on the train are like faces in the wood grain eyes I know, voices I do not recognize.

A family of strangers I live a whole life in trying to remember the feel of my own skin or what it means, the ‘own’ of anything, to have or be, or have it have you also when you thought you were free.

4 October 2006
And there could also be a kind of trying that no one does.

It does itself all round us we feel the effort of it that slips past us we call it wind or call it time or hear falling through the leaves the clatter of light.

(end of Notebook 291)
CAST AT NIGHT

after a night of everyone sin no more it said

And I am a sign, I too have a saint, Thérèse of Normandy who told God to send her the miseries so no one else would suffer absorvent suffering, like adhesive love

How few hours there are.

So little time left to be other people brave as logs breaking free in a jammed river waiting for current alone to do our loving for us our crystal relationships shatter at the lightest touch.

Cat, cat’s whisker my father twirled, it worked, it tuned the crystal, you tuned in to the radio, WEAF, crystal set, you used earphones to turn the groan of crystal into John MacCormack singing My Snowy Breasted Pearl.

Ordinary sound says anything.

Stateside lingo, a path up your arm down which the blood deigns to run and from the all-night diner observation post more than one war is planned and supervised.

1.
If the imaginary tasted the rose the bee a way does or if the inflammatory document once read dissolved in peaceful flames and no more kill you kill me—does a bee do it or does a way bring our weak feet along with it,
or us, old us,
does the way way us?

2. worth worrying about over the Seekonk rush hour eighty percent of the cars heading east on I-195 fleeing towards New Bedford and Boston and China only a few speeding into the purely imaginary west.

LES AMANTES

pass my window street. They walk like elm leaves scuttling in the wind blondes a little withered retaining beauty, as a property of being, hurrying hair in mild north wind swinging their hips in unison with this my canzone.

THEORY OF GENRES

(not said to the panel on Innovation or Genre or something, Friday 6 X 06)

All I know of genre:
One word follows another and I hurry along trying to follow them.

Eventually, out of breath, I lay my pencil down and say What place is this to whom I’ve come?

Close to the beech tree alertness wavers such smooth bark so many leaves dark red high summer one side but the other

Remember the bark the shade we stood in didn't mean at all unless we were there are here.

The sun has a Roman nose eagle-beaked, biggest part of his face and he is all face.

In the sky a huge face, no body but us.

I know all the answers.
They are all No.

7 X 06, Providence
THE SKY IS DOWN

The Thor bell rings
the oak answers

Who am I who walk down your shadow the path it makes and leaves along the listening grass?
