MOURNING

Philip Lamantia died yesterday. My last link with André Breton, with Fulcanelli, Schwaller de Lubicz, last link with the Benedictine Aztec priests, last link with the Tarahumaras. Such a poet.

What is it that I am mourning?

That poets die? That this one did, among so many?

That I will die?

Or that I will lose my link with those who went before?

That in losing them I will lose the world they made, which (sometimes I am afraid) is the only world in which I make sense.

Among so many deaths the measure, meaning, of mourning?

Why does mourning sound like morning?

Does something begin when their life ends?

Is that what mourning is supposed to mean, or do, renew?

Mourning is letting go slowly, is pretending we have a choice and understand the choice so we choose to let him go the one who is already gone.

We talk about it as if there were something rich or fine to be gathered from his absence as if by consenting to it (with music, with a lot of words) we could extract the jewel from the dead body from the gone.

The jewel of absence.

Mourning deprives death of its edge, its finality. Mourning talks big about another life, other meetings, other rivers, rememberings, recognitions, presences.

Mourning disguises absence as presence – the absent body makes real tears flow.

Mourning tries to turn loss into something found, a subtraction into something terribly more.

Mourning denies the dead man the reality of his departure.

Mourning keeps the living from thinking about their own impending death.

But from thinking of that death, and only from that, an imperious energy can arise to marshal life force and give aim to days.

Herr, lehre doch mich

Dass mein Leben ein Ende haben muss Und mein Leben ein Ziel hat sang Brahms, where “the Lord” could be the name of anyone’s dead friend.

How many not dead anymore a celebration of where they went no where they move from and who they met an angel is connecting is this mourning deuil or a bevel edge of cut glass table catch the light refraction and reflection blend an angel is fusing confusing and infusing and perfusing all scatterbrain messiahs listen with the soles of their feet ascend the mountain of noon an angel is time stubble of laughter a flock of lovers hidden in ash trees an auditorium of tree yoga branches break a hush of footsteps in underbrush an angel is arrival coming and keep coming the sun just one more apple elm a river breaks shatter sky and hold my mother paw a word wakes up in you an angel speaks.

“To cut the string that ties her to the moon.”

—Nathalie Shapiro

December politics all moan and why.
March weather built of broken glass.
No calendar believes me but I am come back from the dead unpersuaded of death hell rebirth or even that voice that told me hey come back again.
I am where I fell and who can help me.
It is a day of mourning, forget the paper, all the news is on your skin, let me lick you the back will do, the back of your hand will do, my lick disguised as a Vienna kiss or wherever the engines of old trains drag unwilling settlers across the permafrost this kiss finds you, you think it's me I think it's you but it's just the moon deep in our wardrobe impersonating us.

OSSIA

Waiting at the station cruciform mosaic middle period Mussolini gilt of a god around the blue square halo of the devils for devils have a halo too foursquare since the Devil is the lord of numbers the train is in ritardo nobody knows where while the saints have nice yellow haloes like lemons haloes that are numberless unitary pale the monad in whose light we see this monad light comes listening to me let the light hear the thing we try to be when we say here we are waiting for the train

house of cards ace of hearts you are my upside down
new girl in town

we hear on the radio I translate from the cross saltire raised as if San Andrea over some phony battlement as if this really were the place it is it isn't. Every site has lost its right.

HERO

But who was his father on his mother's side?
So late in whose night by me a mayor of a midsize town in the Midi in March? I love the wind!

Winter music in among the tiles spirit is a part of matter a kind of bone translucent in river of the flesh the ribbon in your hair so many stars inside your roof and a fox below the granary god knows why no hens are handy and the copper bracelet rattles on my wrist but noontime is a sword his work half done he sees the blade of grass and reads the squiggling Arabic of light along the road as the dust rises and falls on the right hand he knows it's time to start the slow descent into the airports of the dark, that city always over the horizon speaking god knows what.

Seeds In Gourd Rattle

I pray the sky
to read out loud to me slow the things that are most close, late-blooming periwinkle say such as we saw one Christmas Day on a hillside north of here blue crossy petals coming out of the snow

Tell Sun for me I know she has enough work to do but rest a little while upon my lap or between my knees depending on the translation she consults jittery with light she comes down to me.

LAR

All these wonders begin to wonder who let them into the theater old hearts full of vegetable music uncles even aunts yet one day I too would fall in love and understand flesh makes up for vapid harmonies Salome, tanz für mich!
And I will give your naked escapades even unto the half of my attention the rest kept fondly fixed upon my Need, that household god who comes and stands looking at me in the kitchen every morning all my life, before and after the regime of so-called Love.

Capture a mood with a melody capture a mind with a word

How do you capture a desire?
Walk through the woods of it with birds in your hair touching the trees to left and right.

THE EVALUATION

Ten carat works just as well as fourteen does because the ions of the angels fit right in insupportably accurate all the time the horror is our slackness Schlamperei said Mahler meaning the way we get into the habit of habit and farewell edge, edge thou most precious and that gold has no matter how alloyed with thee and me and all our discarded amoretti the drinker's breath perfumes the martini keener than wormwood

THEORY OF HISTORY

You can't. Or understand soft pages of a Thirties book full of tennis feats and money not yet in dire straits.

Tom Collins. Because
mindset follows a decade behind the Nasdaq. I still am eating, ergo Escoffier.

We live in dreams. Successful people never wake up, alas the poor red-eyed poets at the rim of things should swallow sleeping pills like Rossetti's chloral hydrate or valerian will keep your cat mind busy while you sleep.

Zzz. That's where the best chance is, reverie and consequence, grandeur and ambition of the sleeping soul. That's why rich men's sarcophaguses look the way they do, all outside and no inside, smooth marble like remembering a dream.

EDGE

I said
and a few flakes dropped along the maple trunk otherwise I couldn't see the sky always has the edge on us and why.

Tell us these things, noble Parachutist, explain how up beyond the single molecule of light there is a single atom of something else and who she thinks she is to let it snow or such and us to build cathedrals and fast cars and memorize other people's epic poetry.

What does she think is going on down here and will it work?

Will light one day go home and leave us in the dark garage, is there another story written on the other side of the dead leaf?

the river

Clatter on sunlight down the road snow nibble at the roots tracks down to the stream but not yet up.

Where did it go.
Crows eat below the snow.

FOR WALT WHITMAN, A TOWNSMAN OF MINE, AN IMPREGNATION OF HIS SWEETEST POEM

When I wanted to learn when poetry happens and what good it does in cities, Death's own greenhouses, or in the army's killing fields, I heard a voice left over from my childhood when I still believed the things I learn'd were true and I wanted to be an astronomer, an alchemist, to summon friends out of the sky who would come to me, when I hungered for the proofs of love revealed in how the figures of desire behaved who were ranged in columns of women and men before me, when I was shown the beautiful entanglements of the ordinary, words you could trip over, how you could drown in maps and sea charts and climb up the diagrams of geometry to add, divide and actually make love with angels I could try to measure while I tried to make them aid me, when I saw them sitting there above the world and heard the astronomer where he busily lectured in my heart with much confidence about the eternal animals aloft that feed on all our dying, our death rattles sound like applause to them, while we in the lecture room of cathedrals praise them – how soon I lost faith in my gematria, all the tricks, the unaccountable chemistry of fear, failure, I became suddenly just a plain man trying to talk, tired and sick but telling the truth, till the moon was rising and gliding over the rooftops of Brooklyn, out over the wooden water-towers of Manhattan, I loved them, those stalwart minarets of the only true religion, on every roof! old wood, old water,

I wander'd off by myself, in all that was left of the mystical, the ordinary moist night-air that all of us, woman and man, easy could breathe, breathe and breed and tell the truth from time to time, I let myself be one among the ones around me, let myself touch and be touched, and if I had a word I gave it to you, you all around me, the ones who look'd up and saw me standing in front of them, gibbering and spouting my poesy, seeming to have something of portent to tell them, some word that was in perfect marriage between them and myself or myselfes, whoever I thought myself to be at that moment, but instead of hearkening they would turn in silence and smile at me and touch me lightly on the lip or the hand and with their whole arm point tenderly upwards saying Brother, Lover, those are just the stars.

Note: When in 1950 I heard Norbert Wiener lecture on cybernetics and the transcendence of human intelligence, heard him in the very precincts of the Brooklyn Philosophical Society where Whitman had heard the learned astronomer in 1865, last year of the War, I knew I had to deal with Whitman's poem I had just gotten to know, deal with coming out from the lecture, coming out into the world of the human, coming out into the stars. I thank Olivier Brossard for summoning me to fulfil an obligation I had left neglected for half a century.

The present text inveigles words of my own, to say my own confusions, into Whitman's text, without changing at all the order of his words (printed here in italics). The reader is free to discard all my words, and readers who do so will be left with the pure Whitman text, fresh as ever.

Owls fitted with devices flit through my metal dreams chasing me down, I am small in there, dreamland the blue, where the grey people move like dust on oily engines slow slow slow. Only owls otherwise, fitted with small transmitters beaming noise into my pineal region I am constrained to understand as messages, images, girls wandering barefoot in ink I guess from the way my breathing goes, or is it mine and not the breath that sleeps beside me dreaming always owls of her own.
