Then it gets cooler then the man standing at the coffee urn turns round and knows you.

This is the time for words.
A word you think is like a candle on a moonless night.
But it is morning,

busy, the urn is steaming, the man is knowing you with his eyes, he is working, this is called working, even though it's morning, you're working too, you're not standing there for fun, you're out on business, what is it, who gave you something to do, accomplish, you want something,

what is it,
tell the man what you want.

Tell me all the stories then tell me the silence they come from, sixteen volumes from Arabic or before Arabic, language of the sand, the wind, the grammar of dawn, one man spending his years.

The power of story in the man who tells the woman's story the woman told. Listen.

Then tell me it all again starting with you, your lips only a little parted, wanting to take care of me the way a story does.

SCISSORS

Orange handles. Dull blade slice sandpaper to make sharp again the Queer Eye said.
But I want only the cut words not necessarily even in half pieces of words, pieces of Wo.

The he there rehears a bleak rehearsal.
My body hungers for its own peculiar kind of light, drumbeat, thought of a cool skin against my rough. But not the touch—just the thought and not the skin.

How much cloth can my scissors cut before I dull? The blunt music of nothing working. Sand fill. Spelunkers getting lost beneath my feet.

A MAN

I was here before you, this earth and all inside it even down to the nickel-iron center of the earth this three-thousand mile long pin whose head is this half-acre all this is mine. But I was here before the earth, earth itself is just the shadow of a poor woman waiting for me.

the apple hangs from the tree and an alphabet of increasing disorder listen, something is always ready to tell you a lie

You can't call yourself a nomad if you walk along a road.
You can claim to be a roam-ad or a vagabond but you're still on infant in the system.
You still haven't spoken your body's own word outside the law. These kids in Prague and Katmandu are just slumming at the wrong end of their Scarsdale neighborhood.

A nomad goes. A nomad goes where no man knows, though women have an inkling.

There is no name for where a nomad walks and even when he's sitting down he's on the prowl leading his camel or goat or best friend's wife, he is the celebrant of elsewhere, the distances all coiled up in him, ready to roll. But never a road.

You're quietly reading.

Then something happens to the moon.

Night after night

you never understand.

In dream it feels for you the edges of your lover's lips and then again you're reading quietly and the sky is gone.

At my left elbow

a leper. At my right elbow a glass of water.

How can I choose?

I hear ponies scuffling on the pavestones

I hear the sun falling through the sky.

SIGN

on the porch table day sign, mottled maple green still on one lobe curling towards dry the pattern on this one leaf shows many many flocked before wind.
Day sign. Look up from reading it to see hundreds of leaves on the lawn not there last night.
The sign is accurate the wind uneasy
as before storm.
Something happening but something always is.

As part of the everything this small remark, a leaf left.
Sky mulch. Soon
it will be now again.

Having one chance in a million is having a chance. Having four billion women in the world is having a wife. Season of storms.
Followed by the season of stories when the snakes are asleep in the ground.

To know so much and not be known.

A hundred tiny midges on this autumn wind orbit each other in a sunbeam whirl each one a god.

CULEX

They stay in sunlight then they disperse move a few yards up the sunbeam and dance again.

But I'm the one who calls it dance their furious agitation, mating, minding, war, I'm left gasping with describing then they're gone.

DYING

Everyone knows how to do it.

But it always seems the first time.

If it were like learning to ride a bicycle

I would fall.

THE NO REALMS

of the gross witherer among the dry diagonals under all the hurricanes. Ha!
Spirit spurt from a Jakobson sonnet, spent in a flume of sheerliness, woman.

Welcome to this hall.

An aria sung out above the lawns by the Blumenwelker himself, the stand-off bridegroom with the hair-dryer blasting the lacquer on the cabinet.
Nobody home. The flowers gone.

“Move three feet and someone will let you go”

--Ari Braverman

Call it one step for a tallish man he loves how he thinks he takes the step

she lets him it is a game

Mother May I? it's called what has happened here?

A story tells, a he, a she,
a mother, a release.

Be my monster the way you were, impaler, neckbite, vampire she wants to say, but the only way she has of saying it is letting go. And when she does where is he then?

He's in a story, a nest of propositions snaking in and out of one another.

He thinks there must be somewhere for me to go. A castle underground, where a woman is sleeping maybe in a room full of spiders and flies.

The faces the lost faces in the orchestra the players behind their instruments the oboe's reed vanishing into such strange lips and all of them so close so close I know each one of these musicians utterly so deep they are so fully they turn themselves inside out into the music's light so I can see them as they deeply are, I know them so deep, I will never see them again, hands on the harp river through me never again.

the way it encloses itself like a bottle of prescription pills labeled against contingency white powder at the base of the cabinet and everybody wonders Will it work this time will I ever get better?

But then the gibbous moon lurches over the pines and you forget the whole thing.

Night on earth no room for doubt.
