THE ORDER OF PATIENCE

Today’s the one I waited for to relent into telling the whole history of touch that every skin is different one is Mörike and one is Proust and one is waiting for you too to bear your name among the haptic wars where I want you

and will no other take or yield my soft because or my hard yes

it has to be you
the skin says
will wait till leap year for that caress.

29 February 2004
CLOSENESS

Closer still as close as tires press some highway on the road to you and let go so quick and evenly a history of getting somewhere with someone,

a sentence full of pronouns mixed all together like a power failure at a crowded dance.

29 February 2004
WOODPECKERS

Woodpeckers prowl the sky why do they have to fly to what they need

are we all tricksters who forgot the trick comedians who left their gags behind?

is he hungry to touch her because of her appetite for being touched?

Always blame the weather because it’s the only one there.

29 February 2004
IN HAPTIC SLEEP

a recollection woke a poor little member of a larger dream

a sidebar, an episode left out of the printed version that went like this:

he saw her coming down the stars like a woodcut in his uncle’s book from far away and all forget, old Rosicrucian, the woman’s seed– he had the wit to call out and she the grace to answer him their little dialogue was printed at the bottom of the page in old black letter

Lady, from which stars do you descend?
And she: From none. Alone I rise to you.

Then it was all telling again, and truth, pine trees, garden anxieties, weather, timetables, lost or stolen children, night coming on and wine and forgetting.

Then it was far away and in his arms and she was looking down measuring her steps on muddy grass and most things she thought have names as wheels have spokes and felloes, hub and rim, but not the things she stared at then his mind tortured to guess not what she saw but what she made of it, the wordless subsoil of her conversation, the girl he never got to touch but for whose sake he lived.

29 February 2004
REBIS

Rebis a body made twice once for itself and once for me as every desperate lover knows a woman casts two shadows one of them visible only to him.

29 February 2004
You get home early when the plane dissolves leaving its shadow on some cornfield west and you are suddenly at your house again opening the door and walking in and calling, not sure if you’re alive or dead but then you’re never sure, you take your pain as a positive sign, an exhaustion, but what do you know about the dead and how they feel? Maybe they get tired too.

29 February 2004
Cornfed light
of every day
a mother in the morning masses and newspaper the different taste
of freeday food
to remember
such things from life and still be living like a haiku
sailing down an artery hinting good news.

29 February 2004
sneezes . worries . wipes his lips . what now is he trying to evade

illness is refuge he supposes . a hard cure in a hard world

29 February 2004
everything he eats or drinks is poisonous

gift the Germans say the given thing, the toxin of reality

    he wipes his nose
not for the first time blows it thinks about Napoleon at Waterloo

the mind is weirder than the world he thinks, and his eyes run

29 February 2004
Yellow roses
after all in blue glass

afterthought

29 February 2004
OLD FRIENDS

I pushed you out of my life and almost out of yours

What can you feel but hatred we both pretend will pass?

29 February 2004
Suddenly words are floating on the air

it is weird seeing them so something about gospels and Peter and denial something about God about Galilee and my eyes too must be part of that story

I can remember no part of my life before this night.

29 February 2004