The essence of it is a kind of revival which for a leaf like me would mean the tree again the spurt of sap up into the slow light the hardening glance to be reborn is to be them all before me and then be me deliberately this time not as a stranger coming to town carrying my fences with me in case I learn to speak.

it might be there it might be hidden in it it might make a sound like a fox in the bush not exactly calling it might be you've never heard it and I've just dreamed it all these years it might be the reason for me and you have reasons of your own

TERRORISM IS BUILT INTO THE SYSTEM

Think of how to birds born since last winter a year's first snow must seem an overwhelming incomprehensible catastrophe. I'm sure they at least never quite believe the spring again.

OF GIANTS

To find the pen suddenly in hand and no word to say to tell the strife of feeling in the giant's heart he takes back from the beech grove takes back from the gull the stone the cloned personalities templated on the projection of his fear of rejection, his so-called affections, he tells the truth he has lost himself in the desert his feelings those stupid angels who scream at him from inside a harp he is that others play and only he can hear the privilege of pain.

And he wants to be done with it and feel from each moment out into a clean world virgin to his glance

comma after comma he writes it down

yet every word too seems to take more of him away.

2.

The giant is a creature whose heart is too big for its body but too small for the world. He hides it inside other beings, who all unknowing help him carry it. Then it happens that the giant is stuck to them until his heart comes back. What a war it is, and how hard to win that heart to come back home. The separation from the heart and the chase for the bearer of the heart and the agony when the heart must be reclaimed, and the torture of actually reclaiming it — these boring and preposterous anguished amusements are what the giant means by his ‘feelings.’ Meantime the real pain of the world is all around him, neglected or not even noticed. This is why, in folklore, giants are always reckoned stupid. Sometimes (is it in the Vafþrúðnismál?) the giants know the right words. But not the tune. There is too much noisy pain in them, feeling this and feeling that, wanting, fearing, wondering, all the clatter of desire. They don’t know the tune, the tone, that holds the words, worlds, together. So they perish.

and the snow persisted falling into itself and the plows make beast noises as they turn annihilating the democracy of the fall heaping and scouring clear a hierarchy of roads.

And full well I know that at this white hour something I can't conceive is traveling towards me singing like a cello it comes standing like a woman hands on hips looking back over her shoulder at me she comes my way backwards as if my future is her past you who were always lost are always arriving.

What happens to Romeo is the tragic version of what happens to Demetrius and Lysander. He believes the evidence of his senses. That's the end of him. He thinks she's dead because he fails to see her living. I say this and I know this, and still I want to believe only you.

TO THE SAD ANGEL OF MY AND EVERY HISTORY

Stand, stylites, stand on a column and be gold

be at the neck of a star be a city's middle windpipe of a word forever on the way to being spoken.

7 January 2002

Telling all who come that she is the one and I believe it for an hour or a day sometimes even one whole morning after Which shows how much time is worth, that sad tract of unbelieving what thought my whole life meant.

the curve of the hour passes time is fractal'd with attention if you go into the curve and become its pure extension time is continuous and infinite but go outside the curve into the eternal — which is the opposite other of infinite — and there is freshness, soma, free.

Beyond the curve is time unbound.

The closer you look, the more things are happening. Time is the plane of happening, and our attention to it forms a curve, fractal, a never-ending always bending line. This line never yields a discontinuity.

Just as a Koch curve extends a line to infinity while all its proliferations are still bounded within a circle that could be drawn around the original triangle from which the curve was generated, so the infinite 'productions of time,' on the scale of event, are bounded still by a circle beyond which there is no curve, no time.

This is pure being, without becoming. Pure awareness without object.

I think it is the way out — but not a way you travel, since it is always where it is, there, timeless. It is not reached, it is realized. Take the goal as the path and be where you are.

a voice in the middle woke me with one word only and I understood

“Do not involve me in the ruin of your feelings

I love you entirely on the other side of what happens” so many things to ask about a peel of lilac coming off the sky over the mountains they talk about rain but I see the core of a flower or a cave, a rock overhang really, and under it a man sits knowing a dozen years until he is the same as what he knows and there is nothing further than his hands.

Flags on their way to work Sad to think those pretty little rags Mean the only answer to death is to kill.

9.I.02

Caught a word here and there smell of hot dust from the heater first time turned on winter values like a new color you never knew

I hear a creaking sound, it is the table under my writing hands speaking as they move, the part of wood people when I was little called the leaf, the leaf with no tree, the singing leaf that tells the grain of the little I know straight as it can.

9 January 2002

I was a gay scientist worried about stars No one can count me
And I will leave all my chromosomes To the holographic museum on every main street Like a lover who wipes himself off with his mother's wedding dress The world folds back on itself fold upon fold With a snickering sound I try to persuade myself is just a dream Are these snarling bored animals all around what I mean by myself?

9 January 2002

It depends on where my hand is in my heart how the children her to break out of school and run like silk flowers down the gutters to the park where left-handed games are waiting they play them a tree here a tree there and you can never tell because I was made of sun meat once and stood on the deck of every burning sidewalk wanting the women the light had just stopped happening on the movie screen inside the cool dark and Eden was over forever patrolled by bored angels with machine guns and no grief could ever get through their sunglasses I was alone with my feelings stuck till the script was over and the boredom of human talk is followed by the boredom of silence again the children run anything is better than school can't you remember?

THE THAW

Melt snow falls off the trees the pattern of bare branches everywhere different intricate and free — I sense but can't explain that every one of these continuous interscriptions of branch and twig and light and snow is the track or trace of someone's mind,
not all the same one,
visible evidence of what thinking is we all are doing struggling towards clarity parity beauty and the branches write it into the sky instructed by the bright mindspace of this one and that one you and me and he and she I mean the actual neighbor minds here shadowed outward in the form of trees lines of calligraphy in a lost language we find every day again breathless surprise the scribbled reality from which we come.

I know too much about this inscribing mind the branches write the story all too clear and it is the same story to which they contribute episode and commentary mingled (a branch becomes its own shadow when the snow slips off) sudden thaw and all our stratagems are known.
Pompey perishes, mystery of battle, why, why, and the silent anguish of those who have to watch the best and prettiest die in noisy agony. All the same story so many minds inscribe. I think I see the language of the world out there molecule by molecule outspoken hard not to interpret but just put to rest hidden someday in the green rags of springtime.

Say so, Mr Star, you don't. no god you say? Then who made the doubt that lives in me at the core of every pleasure?

Isn't god doubt and sudden glory also flaming

in the middle of pain the unexpected outcome the unknown other in the heart of the same?

Just because you can flame all you desire, immoderate chemical,

that doesn't make me, inadequate from the beginning and always departing, able to be sure the pain I bear is meaningless or merely ethical like a nice try or a good idea.

No ethics but reality no chemistry but poetry no mythology but fear — isn't this enough truth to live in a world that may not ever be broken I mean that maybe never worked at all until I do?

Measured by moons some pearls are always wanting like my skin confronted with so many other skins what can that mute attraction be?

Your father tried to explain his life as if you have none of your own—this he called Science, like high school, like beavers drinking milk shakes, like the Ninth of Thermidor. Sorry, that's history. Like Hitler on St Helena's.
Like ambassadors immune from traffic lights, they call them feu in France, fire.

Of course he keeps forgetting what you are lost in his more and more imaginary who of you, the Relationship, the "tenderness on demand" you called it. Or I did.

But who was listening? Me vs world — what side are you on, beloved?
Either party has its points, snowfall between midnight and dawn, wine in the sheets, a touch too playful to be tenderness itself this means, like a man who claims to love you belong to the Louise Brooks Fan Club something is not right. The music stopped.

Long ago. Of course you pick the world.
You like a fight but more than that you like to win. You like to please.
Then punish for the pleasure given.

Spendthrift
Snow
Resiliences

A deck
Apart from its ship.

The moon
Abaft its light.

Everything
Stands behind you Tonight.

My hands are so far away my feet are never, are nowhere this is going to sleep or somewhere going and then gone and all I know is my hands are somewhere else from me

then it was never and a now was wasted by the ruined stream how could all that water break shards of it that cut the human feet that tried to write their essay in those woods nowhere saying this is where you stay it seems to me at your side it seems to me not separate you are the only thing that ever happened to me
