A BOOK OF AS IF

I feel as uneasy as if a bus were grinding up a long hill in my heart.

The skin on my shin looks as if some old Dutch master got tired of his work and threw his paint rag away.

The nape of my neck feels as if it’s raining in Portugal.

I feel as if a crystal ash tray is falling off a table right now and I can do nothing about it though it’s still in the middle of the air.

I feel as if a color postcard from Aix bent like a skull cap were stuck between my bone and my brain.

I feel as if each of my knees spoke a different language.
My fingers feel as if they’re sailors, members of the Mariners Union at a contentious midnight meeting shouting Marx and obscenities across the half deserted hall.

The rock on my table feels as if he’s a schoolboy taking a vital exam in an empty room

My right ear feels as if the woman from the electric company who came to read the meters lingered on my sidewalk to picnic on camembert and wine cooking her neat omelet over a blue spirit lamp

When the humid breeze touches his skin he feels as if the train finally comes into the station.

When I put the telephone to my ear I have a feeling in my right arm as if a Japanese trawler were fishing illicitly the bass-rich channel between Martha’s Vineyard and No Mans Land.
Or as if I’m having a heart attack.
This coffee tastes as if there were middle-aged yogis on the other side of the mountain taking a break together outside their pleasant caves.

My upper lips feels as if six rabbits were crossing the lawn closely observed by a wounded fox hiding in the hedge.

IN THE WORLD OF SENSATION

the buses are crowded but move easily through crowded streets up towards the butte where you can see all the slaves brought back from the coasts of Memoria before the war ended colonies and left us only here. Ourselves in our place. Where touch is the only politics.

THE CHOSEN

If you go there without me it will hurt my feelings but that’s what feelings are for.

If you take me with you there will be a woman at the door who will stare into your eyes and bark “You must belong to someone.”

She will say it tonelessly so you won’t know if she means a surmise or a command.

That is the great moment for me when you interpret her.
I see the wheels spin. I feel myself hoisted from the ground.

HOTEL

We have to put more objects in the room, an obelisk, a pair of trolley cars, a clump of angry civil servants shouting, a Wednesday market where one sells cheeses.
Priests walk content among scornful citizens. A raincloud lumbers over Pelteuza.
Are you ready now? Take off your cloak.
Now a flight of greasy looking pigeons sidles in over the old synagogue, the one with a copper roof and broken windows.
A skateboarder looks out of place having fun in the ruined cloister, a noise like restaurant kitchens, or is it coal sliding down a chute into the cellar of a house where an old woman lies dying.
Take off your dress. Across from the fountain zouaves in their old-fashioned uniforms lounge barely upright in shadowy arcades, acacias are still blossoming purple or white and someone has brought a pony to the park so children study it, run their clumsy thick fingers through its lank mane.
You must be ready now. The colors shift as the cloud methodically erases sunlight from right to left across the plaza, take off your underwear. A radio down there pounds out bottom-heavy blues, archaic as Attica, outmoded as a book but loud, loud. I notice you still are wearing shoes, please, please eliminate them from the obvious.
A post office van scoots in from Adler Street and parks right where the handicapped try to cross the dangerous boulevard.
Lie down. The postal worker climbs out carrying an expensive looking envelope and heads this way. I'm waiting for you here in the empty bed, take off that silly necklace of seashells and amber I gave you in another city another frightened afternoon. Stay in my arms.
Let me hold you in a perfect world.

Handwriting is so old-fashioned.
Writing is old-fashioned,

that's the secret,
to write any word down
inscribes the past, writing is always old-fashioned no matter how new the fable or the form the words bring their old age with them old from the beginning.

Fashion itself
is old-fashioned,
fashion is old,
it makes you think: how young we are!
we are the newest people in the world!
So we feel we have to catch up with this old new thing someone thought up just before us, last week in Paris, last night in Milan.

Trying to catch up with the fashions is always running backwards, that's why philosophers dress exclusively in rags.
Interesting as that may be, Olympe, my point was about writing.

we used to think writing changes the world. In fact writing restores it. Writing with all its blurry dance of signifieds always reinvents the past.

As long as we have writing we will never change the world.

But without writing we would not know or notice that the world has changed or hasn’t, that it’s still waiting for us to finish our sleep.

When the gods or whoever gave us time they gave us only writing to fight it with.

Anything. The permission comes out of the ground. Quince tree. Parable of the Lion.

Break down the gate. Almond. Or hold the city on your back and carry it with you till you meet the woman.

The Rabbis tell us Adam’s first wife was Lilith, but they do not tell us what he was like with her, sagebrush they tell us, and hibiscus, a shady lawn, quinces, they tell us these, and names, names of women, pale-browed names and night names they tell, but we need to know who Adam’s father was.

Beat the Bible till it tells you that. Genealogy. Etymology. The rivers of Paradise flow backwards towards the beginning. Nothing ever started. Everything is just going on. Four rivers flowed from Paradise, we choose our sources, we live by evidence, that glum courthouse word for all we see.

So it is time for the Lion to sing me to sleep, if you don't sleep
you can't wake —
so the nursemaid said,

and she told me I'll see you in your dreams
if you see me in yours, our dreams slip in and out of each other like shuffling the cards, go to sleep and dream of aces, then dream you wake and I'll be there

the nursemaid said,

I am the watcher in the shadows,
I taste my tender sleep and share it with you my favorite child, you feel me inside you as you wake rushing inside you to be out and you wake up like an animal leaping out of a cage running through sunlight scattering the crowds of men till you hide yourself in the jungle of the day.

3.
Her song stayed me.
It led and leads me into a different direction always. I had so many childhoods — choose. I refused to learn the names
of birds and flowers,
I knew who I wasn't and what I needed
was India and far,
blue Himalaya cold
bare chiseled rock
the learnèd air,
circulation of the world,

the news per se
stripped of its dying.

Air sign in fire moon burning. Air
we can see
only when it burns,
shows itself as fire.

The Lady dearly loves the Lion.
Rides on whose back, strokes whose lips with her fingertips encouraging roar,
teasing him to tell.
4.

Every poem is an autobiography, the Rabbis explain. Who else is in the room?

I don’t know the answer, I barely know the question.
But I’ve asked it, that is the important thing.

Go find someone who will tell you his name.
Not his own name (he’ll never know that) but the father’s father, the first no and knower and unknown.

But that which is not known can still be spoken, the Rabbis say. Just as the one Word really known can never be pronounced even when the Sun’s in Leo cool morning of a hot day I bet it will be, a branch fallen in the night, no milk.

INVOCATION

The heat of the day piled high on the western wall, trees bear cloud.
Some days have no movement.

If you are such a day, if you’re hot, if you are waiting for me, call my name in an empty temple and I have come to you already before the echoes fall asleep at your feet.

What have I never told you?
The mosque in Toledo, you see it far away across the plain, first the minaret of course and then the sheltering dome — and that’s the best way to visit certain beauties, from afar, hurrying past in air conditioned cars over truck routes towards innocent bazaars.

I seem to be offering you a sermon not a story but sermons (the Latin word for conversations) are even sleepier, n’est ce pas?  That’s Greek for I’m crazy to use any language but my own.  But (are you sleeping yet?) it takes so long to find one’s own, let alone a language that works for two.

Like you, obstinately vigilant, barely holding down your pillow.
Think of all the birds from which its white tickly feathers came, think what they saw once riding on the morning: a great broad dome spread over the green plain, and roads flickered with quick traffic — one of those streaking cars was mine.
I saw.  I was seen.  The world is naturally pure.
You’re right. Chickens don’t much fly.
It must have been some other bird, some other day, but what I say they saw is right. I hope you get the central issue here: there is a way of looking at things, intensely, caring, but not getting too close.
Use this information when your dream begins if perchance you are not sleeping yet.

CARNIVAL

A big animal eating a big animal but not much. Tough heart, tender liver, a bite of buttock. It is how we make love, leaving most of the body unconsumed, saved for next time or some lesser predator.
Around every relationship prowl lovers like hyenas ready to pounce on bodies weakened from imperfect trysts.

A SUMMER NIGHT

Light the citronella candles, honey, I'm bringing my secretary home with me and we'll work out on the deck. Plug the laptop in so we'll be ready, no drinks, just a Chardonnay and two glasses. And she smokes so be sure to put the crystal ashtray right in the middle of the glass table.
Have Kevin skim the pool, make it clean in case we need to skinnydip at midnight.
Remember we heard the owl call but tonight it's supposed to be warmer.
If we're still working at dawn call the office, tell them I'm in Rome.
Maybe put out a box of chocolates, those Belgian seashells, but no real food.
When the sun is fully risen, please open the beach umbrella over us.
Kiss my lips lightly and brush her hair tangled from so much talking, a moth might have gotten caught in it, nature happens to us all the time.
Say good morning into my good ear then call the priest, they're used to things.
He'll bring a different kind of candle so lead the children out to say their prayers.
Swim if you want to, it won't disturb us, the work we do has water of its own.
