A leaf of this lettuce left for your head and one to curl around the cup of your buttock and you are back where Gihon starts, wrong side of the tracks in Eden where tough girls and their men stayed put when Eve and Adam left, it takes more than an angel with his tool on fire to get you out of town

I go there in dream to visit you but you’re there most of the time among the passionate vegetables —imagine how wild your lovers are, and how the news gets ardently analyzed every day in the green agora!

Adam obeyed but you and your people stonewalled in Paradise, held the high ground you called The Innocence of All Sensation, hence never sinned and never sorrowed.
So a leaf is only for the cool of it against your skin, the light touch of what grows by itself in the world, you wear it or discard it as you choose as someone might listen to music or turn it off depending on his body’s weather, shameless, tough-minded, ergo beautiful.

IT ALL COMES OUT IN THE WISH says the Analyst, the waking whispers tell you this, this is what I want.

And then you know. We don’t need doctors we need courage to kiss our wishes every morning and write them down.

Study this bible thereafter: in these foiled particulars or granted favors discover the features of the Founder’s face: your mind asleep inside desire.

THE IDENTITY

I am a small stone statue wrapped in an ancient piece of yellow silk. I am seven inches tall and am Virmanlis the Leper God whose ruined body shows the soul of anyone who stands in front of me:

I rot with you, or suddenly am smooth.
I represent you, citizen — when you see me you look inside yourself. I am the fulcrum of the world, for I depend on you.

Of limestone someone made me with goat horn horns and amber eyes.
Not even I know where the silk comes from you wrap me in each night, Carasoyn or far away or will there be a bird in your bush again nobody knows.

But I know why
it’s yellow: cowardice.
For only cowards notice everything, fear everything. And that color means the eternity of Earth.
I am detestable and dependable, I will never leave you.
Hold me in the mercy of the cloth against your cheek and breast even and know that somewhere close and permanent is one who knows you as you really are.
We heal each other with our spit.

THE MEANS

Will I ever get another chance to say this now?

No,
so here it is, a weapon that will work against bad magic, especially the kind you make against yourself all night and call it dream which should mean gladness leg over a horse's back and far away.

Your mind's in charge.

Attune it and the world comes tame alongside

it has no choice but be what you will.

COME HOME WITH ME

So much of an invitation as might a tired merchant seaman say come home and find his wife asleep and lie down beside her and not know a few minutes later which was which since both are tangled in the trackless sleep dreaming of the sea is everybody’s business.

NIGHT'S SUNDIAL

Finding my way to the place the place helped. Trying to stay and build a house there (or whatever it is we mean when we say I live here) it was the distance that helped, the tension of where I was as against where some others were or wanted me to be, the wind say, or the shadows on my own lawn always pointing away.

All of them on their way somewhere else, foundlings, property of the state, raindrops brushed off a madman’s windshield driving fast. Who are these people who wake with me?

We share not a language but a need to speak, does language come later?

They have no teeth, their wrist watches have been taken from them, their eyes are all they’re left with, they shout with their eyes, or is it something else, the bone of which all our cries are hung, who are they when they cry, they still have their skin, some of it and some of them, the meat of feelings, because a skin means being someone different from the next one from the one before, they try to dance as they go, travel waltz, terror czardas, hurrying to get there before the time is up and they have no time.

They move along, driven? drawn? by someone else’s certainty, the boots of their jailers, the terrible clean fingers of accountants, the monsters that stir in the abyss of human law.
Whoever it is, it’s always one of us, we do this, one of us is always the one, one who does not know what he’s doing and who he’s doing to, but he’s the one, the one I fail to recognize.

2.
What is working with me here?
Who are these people in whose midst I have been walking for fifty years, not of them, not against them, always a part of them and always apart,

Holocaust or withered rose, how can I know how long my arms are, how far away this skin in I think I touch?

sometimes it’s me in the movies seeing the camps liberated the dead walk out and look at me with living eyes, I am a child, I think of the house that Ussher built, how “they had put her living in the tomb” and all that world fell down, and sometimes her skin is your skin close against me when we’re almost asleep, and I feel those stories coming towards me again, on cardboard and rough manila paper and inky foolscap from the ruined schoolroom of the heart, and then I have no choice but to read them out loud inside myself, as if I wrote them, as if this were my story I was telling and it is nobody’s, all of them, walking till they stop, stopping till I hear them, and I can never know who they think they’re talking to, what they take me for,

and how long ago this single moment is.

WHAT ZEUS’S ORACLE AT DODONA TOLD ME

Is there any certainty?  Forgetting.
Or it may have been forget it.

Whatever

I feel or know will be forgotten forever or a little while or now.
And I will not know why I am speaking.

But you will know, you’ll always know, the link that synapses between us will tell you what I no longer know, the certainty is that something always happens, nothing ever lasts.

Put that in your imported flower pot and let it grow, lavender of Occitan or hot Diego basil, everything grows out of anything, haven’t I told you a thousand times already, every tune is made of only that.

Sing it, with me, you don’t need all the colors, only this drop of dew or whatever it is left on the lawn that holds so much morning in itself, the rest is up to your painter’s eye your violinist’s nimbleness in time, to go there and be very there and never stay.

Then stammer out the glory that you see.
I almost believe you.
Since if it’s here it’s everywhere.

BETWEEN

Between forgetting and remembering suddenly is a breathless gate.
God you think in the bronze pin on which this gate’s hinge turns.

But only love give access to the mind — that is the bitter truth the paltry philosophs and busy mages work so hard to deny or sugarcoat with reason and apocalypse.

OLD ORACLE

They had a thing called a juke box, a boy would go shove or slip coins in it to make it play a song whose words or title formed a text he meant to be delivered as if from him to the girl sitting upright in their booth anxious to hear what texts he means but anxious not to show it, sits knees temporarily close together and smiles down at her rum and coke till he finishes his cabala and comes back.

Then they scrutinize each other’s eyes while the machine pronounces what the boy thinks he thinks about her and she hears what she wants to hear and there they sit, the oracle accurate enough to keep their thighs touching under the pink formica table gleaming with spilled drinks.

I spent my afternoons and nights in that country studying the operations of this oracle which I gradually learned how to operate girllessly all by myself, slid nickels in closed my eyes and jabbed a finger randomly and listened to what the world might say to me.
How strangely different the same text means to one from what it means to two.
What an extraordinary machine that was, meaning dwells in the receiving.

And when at four a.m. the bars would close I’d walk exalted through the humid streets able to interpret everything I heard or saw as messages hurrying to meet me, newly wakened seagulls flapping from the harbor.

<TWO FRAGMENTS FROM SOME OTHER DAY>

Liberty

Liberty is a painting you find scrapped in the street you take it home and study it a while then paint your own face into the picture adding the eyes last.

The Kingdom of Heaven

The kingdom of heaven
is like a towel that wiped the face of a dying man then dried out in the sun.
Now on some grey morning it will finally be ready for you.

(transcribed 2 August 2002) Rose of those someone looking at me doesn’t see me at all something listening carefully hears nothing

let go and you will have me in your hands.
