BRUSSELS, 6 AUGUST 2000. Sabena Flight 551

Only now after thirty years or more of doing it do I notice that my date-line, that begins every day’s work in my notebooks, besides naming and blessing the day and indexing it in memoria (or what are words for), also has a certain old-time journalistic flair.

Imagine me every day of my life writing the article that says the news of my day. Now imagine the newspaper for which all these dispatches have been composed, day after day for forty years. Imagine this paper that has faithfully published them — sometimes front page, sometimes tucked under the list of drunk driving arrests on page 28, next to the funny thing that happened in Canada. Etheric Times and Cosmos Gazette.

“Quod scripsi, scripsi,” said Pilate, in one of the most mysterious passages in the New Testament. What I have written, I have written. And as he spoke it, he spoke with it the credo, not just of the poet/composer, but of language itself. What is written stays written forever. No matter now neglected, despised, rejected, lost, forgotten — what has once been inscribed stays written forever. And now grim that Pontius Pilate should have been the first recorded spokesman of that truth.

It is cool on this plane now, after the frantic airlessness of the airport (lucus a non lucendo, the port where there is no air), the preposterously long concourse with moving walkways only some of which actually moved. Frantic crowd trying to book onto this flight, an hour to board.

We are serene now on our plane. Stewardesses give us nice things, juices and newspapers in Flemish, French, German, English.

We are in the air now over Belgium, which looks like any green place in summer, houses and farms and far away.

So many places to go.

Let a time come when quiet happens Blue face like a mandrill or a clown

A man I know tries to make everyone uncomfortable He is accurate, funny and unpleasant loud, boisterous and mean.
I was much admired in his native country for putting up with this man.
I thought: it’s not that I put up but that I don’t let him in.
To be bothered by his viciousness is to play into his hands and become one more instrument of his self-destruction that he patently desires to achieve in every social situation.

Social means: with people.

The stewardess knows just by looking at us what language to use. I fool her by asking for a paper in German. Thereafter she speaks to me in German. But the other stewardesses, not having heard that exchange, assess me rightly and speak English.

Travelers have only a limited number of body types: slack (rare), tight (common), and the between (occasional).

Nun muß ich Deutschland vergeßen Und alles, was dort geschah.
Gärten und Rosen und Wann seh’ ich wieder die Nebelkrähe?

Berlin, your sky is a museum of Neuertumswissenschaft, science of modernity, Lüneburg Heath, you stretch out so long, all the way to the curved palm of the pallid moon, Hannover, your white horse keeps jumping inside me

O stop the music loud is fascist
don’t you know that yet, into a brown room German goes hurt of senses, bombast of sound that is where the brown-out starts, when power’s lost from the network of social interaction and art the young drunk men get loud Look who has opinions.

Look who is here (there) falling over the farmer in haste to the cow in every barnyard a heap of dung this is not something to write to the Times about this is the way the machine works, the cannibal we are, the party animal the planet turns out to be on which we ride.

Beauty and art and all that queen is pass and by and behind the door I’ve got to start listening again.

The Prostitute’s Story (told by Mariette in De Standaard of 6 August 2000)

I could work in a clean straight, met me rare a pair betweens. In straight wore no man’s last heap or van do prostitutes. I could nat met all bewunders an’ see prating met me. Her is gain over last. The heal schooner muck is fully underwrecked. I could sit neat in one dovecote. So all’s the missies in the Skipper Street. I could drag me so all’s hot whored. I could do go on my work. Point out. For gain gelt for the world will I my steak roll in for a plastic sheen from the dry gay drug straights. It got a door feel, too heetsy and too aggressive into. The concurrency is way too groat. The manner wore up the prostitute door word be opened, stroked, meant met mine ethics.

We heaven oak ounce norm and armwriggles. A good air, breathwardy, prostitute respectered die. She shall neat naked, of half naked, in her between pose errant.

So much for the day’s Flemish.
One needs a different kind of load To stow behind the horse So that trot trot he carries it Along the reliable highway map To the Real World to hope is waiting For you alone at the end of every flight

Into the turbulent city called Home Full of thousands and thousands of people Who want nothing from you Except your body or your money Thank God those things are so easy

We walk heavy on the earth Because we’re taught to walk that way Lead official shoes to hold us down Otherwise natural levity would lift and lift And we’d have to build colleges in free fall Where you could really learn Undistracted by the peremptory Challenges of gravity

Travel silences the mind.

Brussels — New York
PLEURISY TODAY

Where are those diseases That my mother dreaded

Old fashioned diseases, Retro Death?
She feared them for us,

Pleurisy, scarlet fever, Diphtheria (from which She saw her sister die,

And saved her brother herself Digging the proliferating Membranes — diphthera—

Out of his throat with her hands So he could breathe) Rheumatism, walking

Pneumonia, grippe.
And pleurisy, that sounded As bad as leprosy.

And where is that disease Today I haven’t heard in 40 years?

It is strange and almost terrible To live longer than diseases.

in flight
RUNNING UP AND DOWN THE AISLE

Travelling for hours in a large jet is like getting married A wedding without the bride. Or groom, depending.
Endless fuss. Crowds. Touch.
A ceremony you don’t really understand.

Can’t move. Can’t get away. They call it a dance.
Sometimes you find the toilet nicht besetzt and you go in And shut yourself in privacy a tender moment

Four walls and you, just you, That old-fashioned way to be alone.
Then back out among the wedding guests Drunk on distance, fear, anxiety, exhaustion,

Who stumble with you around the cabin.
And babies cry and cry, that interminable Prophecy of theirs that drives you mad with truth.

And long before the plane comes down You notice they’ve stopped crying and Cassandra sleeps And you miss them, miss them, you’re alone with the sky.

in flight
(after reading Kawabata)

When I read the small story I learn how hard the heart Has to work to understand itself,

Harder than a katydid on a hot night or Wolf on bare tundra always hungry Or a rabbi bent over the midnight Law

Because every hour of the day milks Its own meaning from the written text Released just then and no other time

To the student of the word if she listens.

with your pen I carve proudly a new word in the meek morning light of you still sleeping a little rain easy down home

[for Phillip Nicolai, who wrote Wachet auf, and a poem in hexameters in which every word begins with C — Certamen corvorum cohabitum columbis]

An amorist among admirers Aligns an astonishing azimuth And addresses any available arrow At authorities.

    Anarchy achieved!
Age-old anxiety appeased As aspiring authors amass anthologies Agile as apsarases and accurate as art.

You can never tell what a word will let you know

Edges and measures. The art of it, the still Encomium of,

the silence of light

the great gift ever and ever renewed if only we could greet it with a silence of our own.

7 August 2000
But what is own?

A pen you find in some café, a bar of soap you lift in a hotel, a coin in a fountain only Cloacina knows, goddess of the undertow, the floated off, the sucked away, the underoutercurrent, sewer service, the brick intestines of our Rome, the other end

and this also is her mouth.
In Titus’s time they found an old statue of her — we would call her The Recycling of All Things, Queen of Greens,
Die Umwelskönigin,
Environmentula, the world’s phallus hidden in pure flow.

What the water means that marks the earth

I was staring at a weather satellite image of the region I live in. A clear day — there was the Hudson, great and lordly blue in the swathe of green hills and mountains, white clouds sailing in from the western Catskills. And everywhere the Hudson was being joined by larger or smaller rivers and streams. I was surprised at how much blue I saw. I never knew so many streams were there, right about me. Some of them I could name, most not. So I went to the road map, then the atlas, then the biggest atlas I could find — and in every case the rivers are not there, or only indicated as a faint blue line — one or two of them are named, the Wallkill for instance, but most not. There was no attempt to reckon or represent the abundance and magnitude of these affluents. And I asked myself why don’t they show water on their charts.

It means to me
they are afraid of it, afraid of what flows by itself, catching heaven in its hands its legs its crotch spread afraid of what comes down.

They are afraid of the subtle flexible insinuations of water trickling down uncountable channels into the grooves we see from our satellites from our planes, the silver insistences through the landscape a landscape that water makes.

And that’s what they’re afraid of, these roadmap makers, They want to keep the highway habit in us, to run on our little rails through the worldspace as if nothing existed but our intentions they want the map to show a world that humans made towns roads reservoirs the names we put on things and the blue lines fade out, we hide the history of flow which has nothing to do now with what we value, the history of money is standing still in a place and owning the place. In a place and making people pay to be there, to stand on their feet and sit down while lewd water is flowing and flowing lewdly secretly always wanting its own lovely way.

fraid of a little water fraid of a swamp marsh sump creek arm of the sea rivulet damp hole in the ground scared of water scared to touch or be touched

water touches everything it passes colorless democracy of your skin it knows the men are scared of it scared of a channel that made itself

afraid of every power that writhes to its own dance scornful of laws

So that the small rivers and creeks are not shown on our maps, in atlases even, and road maps, none of the fluent is shown because the fluid is the sex of us, the wet of us, the cream on our skin that comes from the sense of us, the in, the sin, the sleek wet intensities of what does not obey any laws, not even its own laws, it rises and falls, it comes by and goes. And that terrifies them, the map men, the chartered geographers of our unstable condition, because water is dirty, because rivers run through our bodies loaded with everything we fear.

In the time of the kings the Romans found, already ancient, a statue in the river, where the great city sewer debouched into the Tiber, a tall statue of Cluacina or Cloacina, the Goddess of the Sewer, the Goddess of the inferior mouth, the one who takes away what has already given us its life and needs to go back to the dark to get more, and they set her image up by the arched brick mouth of Cloaca Maxima sign of every repressed delight, the hot bottom of the world that oozes with everlasting juice, and the map men are always afraid of her, every stream belongs to her, every river is cloaca is her work because a river, even the smallest river, tells us we have not tamed the world around us, it still shapes itself, and it tells us we belong to it, to everything that is changing and hurrying and getting wet and filthy and clean, we do not belong to ourselves.

O scandal of map makers erasing blue lines at midnight a frightened lust still drizzling in their hearts.

7 August 2000
There is a kind of aspiration here discontinuous like music buffering in net congestion scrappy infinities of the heart’s internet attention span ludicrous forgetmenot the only flower I can give is pay attention it withers between us but the aspiration flowers once and stands there dry or wet to mean what I cared once to desire all these universals driving one old car.

Of course there is a measure in matter a plunging neckline in the simplest things to hint of milk to come beavers amiable in the sodden dam, we are for one another, don’t we know it yet?

Mammals. A juice from one into the other flowing all our lives —

individuals, their thisness linking by conscious act rather than the instinctual cooperation of the hive.

The mother can say no.
this is the liberty of life, the kindness of the will,

the lover can say yes, in these permissions the priesthood of the flesh witnesses the hidden mystery: administer the sacrament churchlessly to one another.

Not just milk and gyzm.
The blue electricity our heat squeezes out of blood returning rays out of our Seven Cities in all directions spears focused outward from the Lowest Gate into the absorbing world to find the goal that Will proposes.

All this fluid matter a turbulence in the heart of color we suck to still pain, be soothed, instrument.

I am made for you.
Use me as you would be used delicate, with Saxon craftsmanship along the unspeakable highways that wander alertly into the interior.

orphaned by every hour the gaunt mime still steals his flower overdetermined, a man instead of world.

Closely closely measure Morecombe Sands bewilder monks guide day travelers dry

I pray to the sun for darkness I ask the woman for life she is crouching on a dark staircase there are living things all round her ta ζηα, in each of my mistakes I am guided by apocalypse so loved the world he gave his own-begotten wine I sue the foresters for light everything is a tangle of forgiveness but it is an arcane measurement as by scruple a milk expressed from sad green things my final mother.

    be blunt:
the green policecars akimbo plaza Skins aplenty at far end confront break ranks for Woden his sake who scans us lovesquint from within o Christ a man’s a leper at a woman’s window yearning in bring out your glass a meadow telescope to prod the mutter into deeper wordage that hums the heart

o don’t be so human just hear the trinity crushed fender one

I am on the side of the man on the ground but don’t want to lie down there too but stay up here in the middle air of politics where thinking’s cheap and love alone poses enough delicate catechisms.
