There are fewer sycamores in a town where demons live. Towns like that get white some other way. “Heal my hand,” you hear them saying, or “Isn’t the sea remarkable today” but never tell why.

Rolling the ashcans out on winter mornings, lugging The ice blocks in. I was born on an earlier planet With horses and zeppelins, with mustard plasters and veils drooping over women’s faces — I tell you this so you don’t think

I get my strange powers from this world we share, A world I forget deftly as it rolls into place dazed by our speed In receiving it, our diffuse but adequate appetites. I remember lust that seemed to rise from the desired body—

No way the world can stay dark when that sun comes up. No trees Like eucalyptus, sycamores, birches can prosper Where there is no natural desire. Such trees can’t grow In magazines or courtrooms. Such trees persist

In growing out of us, dream time and touch me.

CITY

Hairy innocents excuse each other in noisy parks.

23 August 1994
And nothing left to fear.
The siege of this little hill, sound of a car crash in fog, distant voices full of terrified blaspheming.
How many names we call to say our own!
_Biscornu_, the funny shapes of things— a man with a bag on his back disappears up the hill in mist.

Weren’t we lovers once he Said to the bee not the tree His current mistress

Didn’t we haunt olive shadows Take trains to Chicago Didn’t we think

Together all night long and now You have no time for me All caught up as we are

In senseless love?

CHO MÊ

I want to write a poem that does not take sides.

25 August 1994
Write a poem that’s not about a squirrel, Write a poem that’s not about a close relative deceased or dying, Write a poem not describing anybody playing music old or new Write a poem with no song but itself Write a poem with no brand names no clothing his jeans her underwear no diseases no guitars no politicians no sidewalks and no subways no cigarettes no swans no pine trees no snakes no balloons no candy no clowns no canoes Write a poem with no reference to language or poetry or God Write a poem with no drugs no neon no birthday cake Write a poem with no love no dream no leprosy no dawn moon rose religion Write a poem with no candles no horses no rain no tears no windows no rivers no red wine Write me this wonderful poem no comparisons no highways no names.

Taking my stand:
leave people alone
to pray and think and play.
What politics will further this?

Their whimsies undo them, give them away as fops, the pool shimmer of their eyes forever anxious for some Next Thing and all their poor actual fishes starved for nurturing.

We are thought.
It never happened.

The dream transpires as the day, breathed by common language, that god among us. Oaks overhear us and go to sleep.

What does she look like the one who holds our whole house in her hand?

“We are protected” is the thing we know of her blue cloud over night roof a hurry in empty doors.

CLIVIA

The clivia is blossoming. Is it the cold spell in mid-August and the warmth come back? Dryness a week while we were gone or. Who knows the roots of what happens? Orange amaryllis-like flowers, buds, one of half a dozen on the pale stem already opening. Who can further what happens?

Showing is not revealing

Revealing is not showing. What is the other difference a flower knows, so that it can open in light’s slow dance revealing, open slow and then be all open and be there, necessarily, revealing what it is to be there beholding?

Flamenco dancers whirl their skirts up and show the pale of thigh, the showing is an index of the ardor of their knowing movement so, their ‘dance.’ What can a dancer know? Something is shown, nothing is revealed, the revelation waits inside what part of her does not move. When the stripper slow or smart unsays her clothes and shows and shows and shows, nothing is revealed except the opacity of sight itself. She cannot show herself.

These are the operative definitions:
Showing is offering what I [think I] am.
Revealing is offering what I’m not. Or what is not me.

As much because of one as other a bratchet yelping for her dog or man his master, who are we fooling, we carry the mourning with us and every orgasm spits in the face of the dead, the consoling weirdness of the other’s body by me a touch at four a.m. either side of the fundamental gap.

But it’s not remembering. It’s prose run off by the yard, lust weaves it in his silly workshop lit with pine torches that have burned —resin flame to resin flame— uninterrupted for two thousand years. Their flickering we hear is the metronome sets us working to its meters. Measures. Meters, mothers, maids, marriages. The click of fire, breath of water and one more fiction pulls a gasping soul into brief cognizance, this swamp society, bath house, sweet earth. The one who told me held my arm with both her arms close to her and I followed.

I smell like a battleship steaming up the Narrows but the clivia is blooming at summer’s end, six surprising trumpets I can see and morning’s cool. It would be worth it to be wealthy on a to like day, cast gold shimmers in wet grass, send food to starving countries and give orders to your shirt collar — the world is always listening. Listen, I got it wrong,

I am a carrion cartoon, a king in mufti, someone you need.
Stagy presences of our public day mill around my mind—gawkward, convinced only of my magnitude but not as what, when what, for what, glorious turpentine to medium some intenser color, who are you?
That’s why a liquid thing men give, not the tiny jewel itself so often slipped whole through the pores of the mind.

You can tell because apples on the tree and deer are busy, dogs carry dead things in their mouths for us, we carry things in our mouths and call them words the hunt is up, hurry. What is under is tired of talking.

It’s the wind’s turn now, that ardent pilgrim who finds the holy in us and comes round. Be glad with me in this last whimsy, more coffee than calvados, but at least when you try to study the quick light on the horizon or above the tree’s dark lacework eyelids will not quiver closed. As mine do. You will see and there will be nothing to say. Welcome to the earth where everything has been said, nothing heard, the club of silence.

30 August 1994
Drunk with exile, we rave in public, these poor common words exploding like terrified birds burst from the trap of our bodies, speaking. Maddened by privacy. Self-protection, doubt. The town meeting where there is no town, Forum where there is no Rome, leave me alone until I need you. Then be wise.

A door
is more than you give it credit for a door is solution mercury darkening the back of the world to show your face whoever you are a door

is everyone.

THE ONLY HOUSE

As if the beam we called the tree then fell and all the times enraptured of our presence fell too and down the staircase of the years nothing we could recognize keeps calling calling until all we have to live inside is that very call the sound of it the summary information of our busy blood the courses habiting our heads the sounds of me and that is all. We live in falling.
