Not to be concerned with that — a river clocking green arrivals o I dreamed a cloud-embattled sky and up into it thin papery irregular balloons they slowly let loose rose cloud-color and cloud-shape till everything we made was no less than cloud vast and beautiful and soon studied apart into blue and I broke down and cried and woke dry-eyed knowing: now the old woman’s dead.

DU PAYS HAUT

for Auxeméry

For all its sensuous appeal the river understands its business is to drain a wound and never stanches its operation but drives our wills before it to the ocean—the Basin of all sentient desires once released (forgotten) by their desirers into the ceaseless agitation. Waves.

The river understands because it’s made of thinking, and we do too, we wading folk who live on estuaries which are just greedy ocean’s probings up our channels to take more—to touch and drink it where it rises in us: the thoughts, lusts, liefs, loves, fears, fars of us up here in the high country of the dream.

This business of keeping the word moving as the eye never stops in its restless holding so sentences caress the seamless world and find no easy resting place except the sudden access of overwhelming feeling to touch just this and linger on a name.
To say you where you are by pronouncing everything there is. To paint the world around you to define your outlined shape by every language and the feel or texture of you by silence. Then the horse bends its head and nibbles grass and squirrels come back from their terror and you stare at me It’s all been said, and said again.
Now it’s a matter of a leaf or a tree, some other me.

The sky belongs to me.
Strong blue Tibetan sky uninflected, big as the mind
the deep of it, always being here.

A sky like that puts me in my place.
In space.

Giving something a title is the beginning of understanding it.

Hyde Park
Errant, being cautious. She lives in Shepherds Bush, disguises her knees as cannibal princesses of some albino isle where Tropics meet the bottom line and wine swirls counterclockwise down her throat. It is a matter of how much we tell our parents, a Christian Scientist searching for the street that runs between the city and the sky.

You can’t do that with tattooed shoulder blades or hair the color of bubble gum, your breath sweet with Snapple and your brain in rags. You’ve got to begin with the classics, pounds and ounces, the gravity of money, the kitchen sink kept gleaming, your closet neat and fragrant — an angel could rent it out to play his zither in and not be scandalized.

Your parents want it this way — be born old the way they think they were. Be impassive as they seem to have become for all their dreads — desires apparently make people dull — only the great poets maybe had the bravery to want nothing. And let it all come, let it hang out with them in their language till in crazy humility they dared to let it speak.

A good day for meeting your guide who will take you to the sacred mountain who will teach you to write poems with coffee grounds and cornmeal who will teach you to count your fertile periods inside your body the weeks of splendor that go by in an instant while you're looking at a tree who will tell you the name of the tree who will drag you up the tree with a new name into the public miracle we call the sky who will take you apart up there like a flower opening or a car crash until you understand the distances are things not numbers.
A good day for meeting your guide who will talk to you with words of glass and explain the destiny of ordinary things like soap who will lead you to the crossroads marked Here There Is Nowhere To Go then leave you there at the beginning of yourself.

IN THE CHALAIS

for Charlotte

Here Byron was bored. Comes from not looking in your hands. Couldn't dance. The women of Evian were women, the women of Thonon were personalities. The glaciers in the south showed sometimes through summer mist. He thought of Jane mixing coffee and tea, of a sick child on a hobbyhorse, a Corsican assassin with scarlet kitchen knife. How cheap desires are, and fantasies!

And he was a man who needed money all the time. Maybe thinking about common things and lusting for ordinary happenings like sex are bad for the bank account. Maybe he should write instead of thinking and save the animal of mind for priceless reverie from which he'd rouse ink-stained hours later, his lap full of gold. The difference between wanting and saying. The chance. He shook himself free from all mere perceiving, the Jura hills like a rumpled coat on a shelf across the mild lake chattering with flags.

AN ABSENCE

To live inside a reed the perceptible residue of stars left on earth at first light is the dry crystalline ausencia at the heart of every dew drop to it he gave the name nostoc as if to say at once it’s “ours” and it is our pain, pain reminds us of our first home lost above.

I want to reach up as far as the wall I want to reach beyond it and find the tree that waits and fills the sky invisibly the tree disguised as light we think we fall through the dark towns of Pennsylvania when we go back to the mothers to nurse shameful diseases our brassy hair the only light in those coal measures from which nothing comes but grief to run away into bigger trouble so that you can come home to a stone bleeding unrepentant done.

TRYING TO BE GOOD

The desperate thing or water boiling as if the skin of a turnip were washed loose not in the cooking but the remembering a Sunday taste with your mother's masher pounding the side dish with righteous wrist this was your virtue then to do what you were asked to do and keep your peace thinking forward into the great body of the world launched around you in successive viking invasions women's bodies overwhelming your poor street whereas you have to scrape it free worse than a potato you have to work hard to eat the resemblance is almost always fatal the girls by the bus and the waves thronging in at Rockaway and you standing in the shade of lilac wondering what a summer is for when those limbs of hers are so pale so pale the north language in her mouth the smoke of her lips the red of her absent-minded kisses o the things a child remembers instead of what might help him he holds all this happy horror in mind all his days don't you you with your habit of facing north and west and being so doubtful of summer wind you with your fjords chock full of imaginary kingdoms and your bookshelves dusty with orris root and talcum and salt there is no one at home in the memory do you understand no one inside the heap of details and made-up particulars you have spent your life worshipping as if they the blue and the wool and the china of them the candle of them the gas flame before breakfast and the flickering coal were the gods of the whole universe and nobody home but you and you're not home you never were you leaned on the kitchen utensils you ate the plate clean you read at the table you understood nothing you never asked why they got married or who walks through the house when everyone is sleeping and blesses them until they wake you atheist you eater of cheese you inspector of labels you man.

IN THE HEART OF WEATHER

for Bosnia

Ears numb, cold to the point where I thought how nice it would be to curl up by the hot spotlight below a sign to shelter when I smelled the pine trees, the sheer clear heavy horny balm of them like a noontime in July—and I understood a man’s relation in the world crucified in joy between space and time with nothing ever on his mind but weather.

I am trying to say that desires and fears are the weather of the mind, mind the blue unchanging sky.

But this is the thought of a man with a house a mile away to go home to, be home in.

What would this cold this smell of balsam be if there were only here?

Would it be dwindling into mere sensation till the dark hides life wherever it came from, or is there an energy in what just happens that would sustain me or any person in the long exile it is to be just here?

I think of the children of winter trapped in Lebanon and in the hills above Sarajevo fierce young men hell-trapped in hatred freezing with hate and warming their fingers on their guns and in the bombed city someone lies in the street wanting something, smelling something, feeling whatever he feels.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY,
“THE SCANDINAVIAN,”
OF FREDERICK COWAN, 1852-1935.

This could have been Brahms across a crowded schoolroom a woman outlined against the huge window reaches up to pull the yellow linen shade all the way down.

Whose name means “You desire this” middle syllable of the world you are the secret word say it and the wall falls down and there The Temple is it's been there all the while hidden as silence.

Because of your great beauty you believe that all results are alive in their causes, and all actions are shadowed by their consequences shadow-heavy autumn clusters in the hand.

AND I IN ARCADE

Theater sets hearty happenstance we call what happens there firs stand tall Cybele's quotas joker hurt aside chatter a lode's guilt gauss sup on idle magnetism?

Do we dare to dance or do we? Is the mast ready for the Ponent shore? Do we even now recall to disencumber the blatant discos of our history (timeless mindset, mindless repetition).
Why daunted don't we do something to Serbia?

Is it that mounted king or dragon whose bronze image in the hands of Cat People woman my first love turn squirming in the park into the animal I thought a goddess would distinguish herself from the actual tree but no never she is the smell of it for all my prayers to her for all my life she is the wood.

The tradition of writing with ink stiff pen a burden of opinion to express on this and that (it is dangerous to put yellow and red together in a national flag, sugar causes social unrest, birds talk) the tradition of being wrong at length and to music the tradition of remembering names of those who never lived or if they did hid themselves from us behind time's bodice a scent of person lingers after the dream is gone.

Find a nest of hawks find a chalk cliff find a soup boiling with the moon in it find a sealskin coat your mother wore find a crow’s nest

This is what I’ve wanted for two days And to take molasses to Barbados and say Here, give the sweetness back to the world I want only the thickness and the fear fierce taste tropic noon the knife

CELEBRITY

Smooth face the eye slips off people impossible to see here if anywhere the dubious benefits of photography.

30 January 1993
A WHIFF OF CHEAP CIGARS

There is a kind of patriotic gall thinks This is best. And that's all right, thinking that way. But saying it!
Out loud and on the radio!
With a guitar!
    That's the horror, ferocious ignorant sentimental rumble like all the bowling alleys from here to Dallas.

Grey cat stalks towards bird feeder. Shikari. Snow supports alternative life styles oxygen animates. Why should I disquiet myself rescuing one life from another?

(Yet I leap up and run to the porch and breathe like a maniac to save those many from this one.)
Look
the first map of it of anything
our eyes taking,
mistaking.

It is a place.
Smoke goes up,
you remember a dream of don't smoke (you don't smoke) Walk more (you walk)
There are consolations such as silence the thrill of waking—day: the mind in control of itself a little not thrown from thing to thing lusts and lunacies down the admirable cataracts of sleep.

They wanted to come across to us these aging men in wet Woollen suits their grey fedoras brim-bent down over grey Glass or blue-green eyes that will not look in yours the Labor Representatives in ochre mandate shown malingering Along the beach spas of the southern shires my father Was a worker in those wills, he swept his hat off at a maiden Passage he held the squibs of damp November in his sky.

Then being born I took the spring out of his heels and my day Stretched into his evening. Time is. No one trusts the ones He trusts to represent him. One. There is a gender in these Images, the sex of fire and holy marriage of blank things. There is something wrong with people they fight too much.

War is a systematic madness. There is no vegetative power In the broken clock the bombed out tower, there is no grief Like the burning book the starving child the withered leaf And all things runs that way the river has no insight the oil Falls out of the sky as rain the prisoners long for night to hide Loneliness of their all too private skin. To be trapped in many When you are not even one. When we were kids we called this The troll. It was the voice beneath the bridge, the footsteps Late night in the cellar. It had a blank white face and looked in Every window. That it meant no harm was more frightening
That it was just this stupid looking calling treading calling And if it knew nothing else it knew we didn't want to hear.
No body wants to hear. It wants to dream forever safe In the sierra of its bones the endless archipelago of sensations From which that stupid other person rouses us to mean what?
Where workingmen are out on strike. Where the blue Platte Skims the music of sweet prairie poas and leaves us gasping For more smell. For sound. More light. No one's body Snug in our arms and very real. Like a road. Like a camera Never there when you need it. When it finally comes Down out of the sky and shows itself. You are dressed For a different occasion. You touch yourself with identifying Purpose. They know who you are and maybe always did.
The men shuffle in their overcoats. Miners wear tweed jackets And white silk mufflers. The steamfitters worked three shifts In the Navy Yard until they dropped dead. The way men do From failure to recall their dreams. Sleep is a pretext for it.
And that too we called the avenue of the troll, the long long Street shadowy with ailanthus and streetlamps. A battle In wet clothes blue of the gas stove on a grey morning. Victory.
