6:10 A.M. the sun is fresh the houses all have flags separate domestic religions

Sometimes the light looks used but not today,

today is the yacht race Blues against Yellows and both will wind and here's the Pineapple against the Watering Can and weeping children shoplift from black markets and white markets.

MORNING IN NEW BEDFORD

The catch is sunlight we dream in shadow slouching towards coffee of great whales up side streets past the Fish Lumpers Union old church now Teamsters Hall
we dream about Trotsky, about your father driving Schachtman to America, we dream of salt on the way to an island.
Cure me in Paradise of hope and fear.

8 June 1993, New Bedford
At the because of things a woman waits.

Of course it would be a woman, outlined in strong morning seaport sun.

The shape speaks. Deciding where the dawn came from.

Daddy, where does the dark go?

It goes back down in the mine where the gold comes from lifted to the light by black slaves sluiced down after every shift to recover whatever of value might cling to a man, the skin of a man,

the value,

a man owns only what is south of his skin, if that, only the dark.

Which goes back down and down, so far you could never imagine, the black river and the never seen lagoon and down there the money grows leaf by leaf quivering papery rustle soft in the dark.

—This is what the sea said to me this morning as we dared her in New Bedford and she scandalized as ever by the land, still haunted by the fabulous rumors of repose.

The wake of the Alert spreads and recedes and finally fades like a thought from the mind traceless a memory of motion nothing moved.

WHEN THE ANGEL COMES

for Charlotte

The day comes market. The angel gets off the bus surveyed assayed the presence pondered. Off the boat.
Up the sand. From the cloud falling on our land the fallen comes.
Will not tell you where I am or whence arriving. Gull laughs. That's not English around here. I will not tell you.
And no one ever did. We had to compute it for ourselves, using a rigorous species of scientific analysis called fantasy.
Then we understood. It comes as torment wrapped in sunshine, reminding rain.
Scintillometry of arcane visitations.
Who are they coming silver through the door.
“I will not tell you...” later came to mean I will not let you know. Everything is underhand. The secret majesty that rules the world stands arms akimbo over everything you see.
Spray of moisture in the wind, eye on the far cliff. A cloth gets soaked in five minutes though no rain is ever seen. What do you see.
“...not tell you where I am” became I will not let you know where you are.
You stand nowhere, morning and no prayers, thinking about bare-bottomed boats a mile from the ocean. Pine for it.
Dark Italy of savage prayers and earnest gods you never heard of cut the tree and shaped the mast — now who will bring it to the launching shore, the easy? You will never know your own coordinates, you are movement and cannot be known by simple men. By numbers. By any color said. Wind eye full of rain looks like us.
Nowhere or never or not there. The reckoning counts the waves on Barges Beach and adds the beautiful despair of being here.

I am too alone to stretch the world.
I have to recreate it new out of the magma and the sea.

We are the street.

I am impressed by this rising sun I am later I will cross something with something else and get a flower or a new hat I might win a flowery apron from Grobe the butcher I can wear on my naked thighs into battle because the sun makes androgynes of us to wit our shadows a fierce world with dark distortions extruded onto the earth: they follow us so much for sunlight nature unity and progress I am not a pessimist I am fond of potatoes grow in the ground.

Island manners. Silent at home we shout in the street. When we do not tell our loves we light up our eyes with and stare ardently in the faces of strangers. We do not answer. An island is all the waves coming to it from every side and no going. Once an island, always.

Maxwell House an old can of it in the cupboard surprises me by being drinkable, me the big coffee maven with my Ygarchefe and Sanani actually like this. And then I remember (some days I'm as smart as Frank O'Hara) Monica Polowy from Buffalo serving Maxwell House in sunlight to Bertram Turetzky Jerry Rothenberg Kathy Acker and the rest of us artists-in-agony or whatever they called it one beautiful windy Sunday in La Jolla while the eucalyptus trees creaked in the sea-wind find us find her find her find us we are wild geese and elegant polaques at the court of the Roi Soleil, we are maidens our hips not unfamiliar with fog. Litotes on their lips they lie and lie. What kind of heart could a cup of coffee have?

Suppose the smell of ammonia came up from the sea instead. And the clean land glistened like a middle-aged man dreaming of Egypt. Pharaoh. The least of it was the weather. Perhaps in the feast of dreams he understands the josephing on every wall—but o for a pure blank brick, an uninscription, undiscussable, sand. The shine of it is more than he can withstand. Intelligence shared with rock. Swallows dive quick and we will suppose that he opens his mere eyes. Nothing smells of anything else. His world has a lovely fog to it today. His heart remembering nothing rises hopeful as a gull. Our dreams are our past lives, dummy. Wake.

MAN SLEEPING

He had been sleeping for an hour and the ocean changed he had been dreaming towers and the sand stretched west trying to engage him in one more continent. Elephants and equipose. Entrain. They wanted him to be England, they wanted his France. They wanted his sleeve full of doves and his desires to be be as delicate as frog spawn dry in the noon time heat. He wanted nothing of what they wanted of him, slept again like the barque Unparalleled ran aground off this shoaly island full of bibles and Dutch cheese. Red skulls of it wedged in rocks for weeks till gulls and weather woke him reeling from the Carpenter's embrace —whose tongue was talking so fast in his mouth?— am I wood or water? Shanks of maple, hips of seaside roses, he was heaven. And woke some more. Mostly fire. Mostly air. Air was first of all elements, the moving before somethingness. Mornings before a single man has gone to work—he woke and woke, a few things clear. There is no creator, though a Making Spirit comes from time to time and welcomes us from inside out into our own world. Making things as fast as we can think. In what language written was the book you never opened? Who was the mother of the door? Clear too was the interactive web of influence, a day’s your motherfather, night is your child who dreams you further into the meek eternity of time. The sun is your little dog. No wonder kings fear to go to sleep and fear their daughters. He had been sleeping for a couple of hours and the sun bit the sea. The scorching of what he sees until the looking is a kind of dark resentment, Quiet birds bothered beings he couldn’t see. Desperate loyalists counter rebels in the woods. A rabbit hobbles towards the shade.
No religion on an island.
No one will relinquish money, a revolution is shattering the mirrors only, doesn't change the endless empire of Light, every blood-slimed sliver of the glass still reflects the intolerable injustice of this one-life universe.
He woke and knew it had to be something else, other, had to be seed sown in another summer that we reap here. Or else the meanings of our mind were only money.
All thought is consolation and an angry man.
He woke late and took a cab to work, it hurried yellow deep below the bay, his head hurt with so little sleep, waking and waking, his whole life an endless something, carouse, cartouche, his name held tight in someone’s handkerchief, lariat, the cab crossed the burning plains safe from animals and reached the northern business district his eyes were hot with keeping open the boys tumbled out and left Russ to pay the fare with his long Pall Mall cigarettes his failed midnight. He woke and it was insolent like any island. Druids came hazarding down from violet schooners perched in lower clouds —now under Avalon a wall of sea stones masoned thick with visionary mortar held back the lilac thickets still blooming late as June and the tanager therein gossiped with the young wife passing and a duck skims down the sea beach.
Daylight forgives you. Stamina of sleeping men. It takes all our energy to stay asleep when there is so much angry waking.
Into this one bottle he squeezed his vital sap and woke with a strange feeling in his hands as if someone held them. Pressure from inside out. Who wakes?
The house on Canapitsit Neck looks like a fortress outlined against the levant sun a small or local gloom, bastille of energies, all beauty locked in fear. He woke after three hours sure that someone had died, a lord or kindly one, sun's serf perhaps or mind's loving-kindness's minion/Every time you wake a great king dies.

All the ways we make our letters tell I have fallen because I am only and risen because bright here fog bank over the Vineyard asking,

    If I shape it differently every day will the ocean alter?
    Will the character I speak Light. Can I be light?
    Imitate everyone because no one—is that a threat or promise, a primrose in shadow on the wall by the waterfall?

How can I hold my own against the sea?

By not telling what’s on my mind.
By letting it tell the truth in me.

12 June 1993, Cuttyhunk
The sea is warm today, low wind the light amidst it. Every different day. Determinant of how a hand moves, an eye remembers. Men comforted by the noise of their machines.

A SMALL SET OF VARIATIONS AGAIN ON LI SHANG-YIN

A lute with —but I don't like plucked soft sounds such they hum a little in side my bones before ceasing to say—stars on it but I can't see stars this weather in my eyes only the tumult of she looks at me and the whole sky's be tween us everything regular as sin sense sun sea, the lute but I hear nothing

needs a hand or two a knee to rest on for all its stars I can't see can't bother with the music as if a lute had anything to say or some star is as love is armor of a sort against all possible inferences just this one piece of wood —sound or no sound—hums in your lap subtly complaining.

12 June 1993, Cuttyhunk
He woke after four hours with his shirt on inside out a maiden led him to a fountain or fled him in the mountains, he drank of whatever he found was flowing, things come back thirsty from eternity wake up the day is made of wood she had to run he slowed to let her disappear a grove of aspens quivered by the sea things he was allowed to remember surely not one of these the greasy red wrappings on his prayer bundle laughing seabirds fishermen trying to decode the foggy banks the mind is ultimately happy and all pleasure comes from its solitude comes from its embrace he woke reading the coarse grain of granite smooth insinuations of agate a dimension washed up on the beach cacchinations man or bird for his embrace the polyester multitudes Nepali boys strutting by the monastery gates unsmokably damp cigarettes in monsoons a breath of hill air and a deep drag to get anything baseball cap with fishy visor costumes of the self-dissuaded. It is two hundred years from the Vendée and finally he gets it.
No one ever wins. It is a process of elimination, all of us used and worn down and cast off chaff and draff and urinas to build some Other Body strong and we go out.
Who is the Body all our deaths are buying, rebel and royalist alike, our black, your white?
He woke after five hours, were they the tops of fence posts out the window or ancient monuments up the glacial hill, tips of them tall on the far slope facing the open sea the world came from, to be here to meet him. Is he a bird again, what kind, where is the book he woke?
He heard a tree fall two hundred miles away it was his heart linden his folk tree his appetite.
Now things were cooler in him, Egypt further, deciding against sun glare he knew the fish were there the ones he wanted, ordered pairs, gods obscured or youthful powers, knew were there because he's seen the likes of them slammed down on jetties gape-mouthed dead in the quivering air thirty pounds each of them and a knife in the harbormaster's hand.
Explain the imbrication of their scales, the feint of color as the sun explored them. Wanting to eat them in his childhood way, haddock stew or fried cod, what could be better, scour the unsuspecting elements for wise animals not wise to you and eat them. For Wisdom's alkali, shriek of potassium in dying cells, if he could sleep long enough he'd understand the total genome of every species, the long count. But never why found it fun to kill.
His hands shook with numbers. Was it numbers?
Inside yourself you sleep alone.
He slept in the toaster in the dinghy in the hap between blue blue rocks on Church's Beach just before you get to the wild sea poppies egg yellow in even light he favored.
The smell of freshness in his line-dried shirt is just another smell. Why choose?
White shoes. A gold cart snarled and some robins flew away, it's almost sleeping in him now, shouts of young men the far-off giggle of island women at the last end of their slow twilight mumble in his lips. Patterns.
What could a pattern be but death or sleep?
Glare on pale oak, is he seeing?

WHITE ROSES

Why don’t I ever mention the white roses? They are there rarer than red and seldom among those others mostly nested pale among those vetch-leafed pea flowers thereby made violeter. White roses and rocks of most colors so turned to look like human form a haunch a shoulder lifted against the sea

June a blue northeaster promising fair weather quiet among the white roses.

THE BLUE NORTHEASTER

brought as they promised what they call fine weather. though it is not fine to me, since rain is my religion. This is just atheism, a day with sun in a sky without a hint of commentary. So all words (nice day, fair weather) should be in quotes, the Young Man in me insists. I rebuke him with the obvious — every word has been said before, if it had not been spoken it would not be a word, would not be here to tell the tale.

Now there are men who listen to their bones, and know the noise the mind makes at her endless work of separating organ from organ in the profound dark of our cells, “selves.” These sounds they recognize and speak again, realizing that the inside is far outside also, and no word (in quotes or otherwise) goes long unheard.

The sea is burnished from the rocky beach to Canapitsit Neck — and these precisions also have some meaning, though not as much as the least sound They heard.

A woman in white takes a little dog out of the back of her four-wheeler and carries it awkwardly on her forearms up the hill. It is a heavy little dog. Silence. A robin perches on the car the woman left.

These bulletins from the Infinite Suppose.

Guided away from the adequate, one makes a mess of everything but perfection. I say this to those who like to note the kinship of sanctity and neurosis, yet doubt the prevenience of grace. Spontaneous blessing of the Lama, working years before it’s needed. And all the while it is.

The subtle and beautiful Nepalis make excellent customs inspectors and watchmen at the gates of dream. Bribe them with a few Images, and they’ll let you wake.
Cross a word out in such a way the word and the line that crosses it out have nothing to do with each other. You meet long-married couples like that.

Thinking, writing? An idea is a boat adrift on the huge sea of language. Anything can befall it, and it can only go where language—some language—goes. Better to study the sea.

Magic of shores. Amazing common shore between idea and language, between actual and possible; how to reach the shore? Nothing makes sense but the shore. Remember it in the mountains, the wind here stirs the strings of the harp. Bring it home, listen and try not to remember.

Swallows are frantic at the little pond. Couples: geese, gulls, rabbits. But a tribe of swallows grazes fast on unseeables just above the water level. They feed on proximity alone. I eat the closeness of you.
